

Case No. 352

Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970)

Applicant: The Republic of Namibia

Respondent: The Republic of South Africa

Case No. 692 is a closed case. The enclosed record contains the only references permissible to bring forth before the United Nations International Court of Justice. Citation of references outside this record constitute grounds for dismissal.¹⁷

Table of Contents

Case Summary	3
Statement of Fact	5
Questions before the Court	7
Opinions of the Court	8
Advisory Opinion (Majority Opinion)	9
Dissenting Opinion (Judge Gros)	60
Dissenting Opinion (Judge Fitzmaurice)	84
APPENDIX I: Universal Declaration of Human Rights	156

Case Summary

Citation. I.C.J., Advisory Opinion, 1971, I.C.J. Rep 16.

Brief Fact Summary. Under a claim of right to annex Namibia, South Africa occupied its territory in violation of a United Nations (U.N.) Security Council Mandate which though later terminated due to South Africa's breach, empowered the Security Council to enforce its terms.

Synopsis of Rule of Law. Member States of the United Nations are bounded by its mandates and violations or breaches results in a legal obligation on the part of the violator to rectify the violation and upon the other Member States to recognize the conduct as a violation and to refuse to aid in such violation.

Facts. Under a claim of right to annex the Namibian territory and under the claim that Namibia's nationals desired South Africa's (D) rule, South Africa (D) began the occupation of Namibia. South Africa was subject to a U.N. Mandate prohibiting Member States from taking physical control of other territories because it was a Member State of the United Nations.

The Resolution 2145 (XXI) terminating the Mandate of South Africa (D) was adopted by the U.N and the Security Council adopted Resolution 276 (1970) which declared the continuous presence of South Africa (D) in Namibia as illegal and called upon other Member States to act accordingly. An advisory opinion was however demanded from the International Court of Justice.

Issue. Issue: are mandates adopted by the United Nations binding upon all Member States so as to make breaches or violations thereof result in a legal obligation on the part of the violator to rectify the violation and upon other Member States to recognize the conduct as a violation and to refuse to aid in such violations?

Held. Yes. Member States of the United Nations are bounded by its mandates and violations or breaches results in a legal obligation on the part of the violator to rectify the violation and upon the other Member States to recognize the conduct as a violation and to refuse to aid in such violation. As Member States, the obligation to keep intact and preserve the rights of other States and the people in them has been assumed.

So when a Member State does not toll this line, that State cannot be recognized as retaining the rights that it claims to derive from the relationship. In this particular case, the General Assembly discovered that South Africa (D) contravened the Mandate because of its deliberate actions and persistent violations of occupying Namibia.

Hence, it is within the power of the Assembly to terminate the Mandate with respect to a violating Member State, which was accomplished by resolution 2145 (XXI) in this case. The resolutions and decisions of the Security Council in enforcing termination of this nature are binding on the Member States, regardless of how they voted on the measure when adopted. South Africa (D) is therefore bound to obey the dictates of the Mandate, the resolution terminating it as to South Africa (D), and the enforcement procedures of the Security Council.

Once the Mandate has been adopted by the United Nations, it becomes binding upon all Member States and the violations or breaches of this Mandate result in legal obligations on the part of the violator to rectify the violation, and upon the other Member States to recognize the conduct as a violation and to refuse to aid in such violation.

Case Briefs

Statement of Fact

the Council's attention to the necessity in its eyes of treating it as a dispute.

In the alternative the Government of South Africa maintained that even if the Court had competence it should nevertheless, as a matter of judicial propriety, refuse to give the opinion requested, on account of political pressure to which, it was contended, the Court had been or might be subjected. On 8 February 1971, at the opening of the public sittings, the President of the Court declared that it would not be proper for the Court to entertain those observations, bearing as they did on the very nature of the Court as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, an organ which, in that capacity, acts only on the basis of law, independently of all outside influences or interventions whatsoever.

The Government of South Africa also advanced another reason for not giving the advisory opinion requested: that the question was in reality contentious, because it related to an existing dispute between South Africa and other States. The Court considers that it was asked to deal with a request put forward by a United Nations organ with a view to seeking legal advice on the consequences of its own decisions. The fact that, in order to give its answer, the Court might have to pronounce on legal questions upon which divergent views exist between South Africa and the United Nations does not convert the case into a dispute between States. (There was therefore no necessity to apply Article 83 of the Rules of Court, according to which, if an advisory opinion is requested upon a legal question "actually pending between two or more States", Article 31 of the Statute, dealing with judges ad hoc, is applicable; the Government of South Africa having requested leave to choose a judge ad hoc, the Court heard its observations on that point on 27 January 1971 but, in the light of the above considerations, decided by the Order of 29 January 1971 not to accede to that request.)

In sum, the Court saw no reason to decline to answer the request for an advisory opinion.

History of the Mandate (paras. 42–86 of the Advisory Opinion)

Refuting the contentions of the South African Government and citing its own pronouncements in previous proceedings concerning South West Africa (Advisory Opinions of 1950, 1955 and 1956; Judgment of 1962), the Court recapitulates the history of the Mandate.

The mandates system established by Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations was based upon two principles of paramount importance: the principle of non-annexation and the principle that the well-being and development of the peoples concerned formed a sacred trust of civilisation. Taking the developments of the past half-century into account, there can be little doubt that the ultimate objective of the sacred trust was self-determination and independence. The mandatory was to observe a number of obligations, and the Council of the League was to see that they were fulfilled. The rights of the mandatory as such had their foundation in those obligations.

When the League of Nations was dissolved, the raison d'être and original object of these obligations remained. Since their fulfilment did not depend on the existence of the League, they could not be brought to an end merely because the supervisory organ had ceased to exist. The Members of the League had not declared, or accepted even by implication, that the mandates would be cancelled or lapse with the dissolution of the League.

The last resolution of the League Assembly and Article 80, paragraph 1, of the United Nations Charter maintained the obligations of mandatories. The International Court of Justice has consistently recognized that the Mandate survived the demise of the League, and South Africa also admitted as much for a number of years. Thus the supervisory element, which is an essential part of the Mandate, was bound to survive. The United Nations suggested a system of supervision which would not exceed that which applied under the mandates system, but this proposal was rejected by South Africa.

Resolutions by the General Assembly and the Security Council (paras. 87–116 of the Advisory Opinion)

Eventually, in 1966, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted resolution 2145 (XXI), whereby it decided that the Mandate was terminated and that South Africa had no other right to administer the Territory. Subsequently the Security Council adopted various resolutions including resolution 276 (1970) declaring the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia illegal. Objections challenging the validity of these resolutions having been raised, the Court points out that it does not possess powers of judicial review or appeal in relation to the United Nations organs in question. Nor does the validity of their resolutions form the subject of the request for advisory opinion. The Court nevertheless, in the exercise of its judicial function, and since these objections have been advanced, considers them in the course of its reasoning before determining the legal consequences arising from those resolutions.

It first recalls that the entry into force of the United Nations Charter established a relationship between all Members of the United Nations on the one side, and each mandatory Power on the other, and that one of the fundamental principles governing that relationship is that the party which disowns or does not fulfil its obligations cannot be recognized as retaining the rights which it claims to derive from the relationship. Resolution 2145 (XXI) determined that there had been a material breach of the Mandate, which South Africa had in fact disavowed.

It has been contended (a) that the Covenant of the League of Nations did not confer on the Council of the League power to terminate a mandate for misconduct of the mandatory and that the United Nations could not derive from the League greater powers than the latter itself had; (b) that, even if the Council of the League had possessed the power of revocation of the Mandate, it could not have been exercised unilaterally but only in co-operation with the Mandatory; (c) that resolution 2145 (XXI) made pronouncements which the General Assembly, not being a judicial organ, was not competent to make; (d) that a detailed factual investigation was called for; (e) that one part of resolution 2145 (XXI) decided in effect a transfer of territory.

The Court observes (a) that, according to a general principle of international law (incorporated in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), the right to terminate a treaty on account of breach must be presumed to exist in respect of all treaties, even if unexpressed; (b) that the consent of the wrongdoer to such a form of termination cannot be required; (c) that the United Nations, as a successor to the League, acting through its competent organ, must be seen above all as the supervisory institution competent to pronounce on the conduct of the Mandatory; (d) that the failure of South Africa to comply with the obligation to submit to supervision cannot be disputed; (e) that the General Assembly was not making a finding on facts, but formulating a legal situation; it would not be correct to assume that, because it is in principle vested with recommendatory powers, it is debarred from adopting, in special cases within the framework of its competence, resolutions which make determinations or have operative design.

The General Assembly, however, lacked the necessary powers to ensure the withdrawal of South Africa from the Territory and therefore, acting in accordance with Article 11, paragraph 2, of the Charter, enlisted the co-operation of the Security Council. The Council for its part, when it adopted the resolutions concerned, was acting in the exercise of what it deemed to be its primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security. Article 24 of the Charter vests in the Security Council the necessary authority. Its decisions were taken in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter, under Article 25 of which it is for member States to comply with those decisions, even those members of the Security Council which voted against them and those Members of the United Nations who are not members of the Council.

Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia
(paras. 117–127 and 133 of the Advisory Opinion)

The Court stresses that a binding determination made by a competent organ of the United Nations to the effect that a situation is illegal cannot remain without consequence.

South Africa, being responsible for having created and maintained that situation, has the obligation to put an end to it and withdraw its administration from the Territory. By occupying the Territory without title, South Africa incurs international responsibilities arising from a continuing violation of an international obligation. It also remains accountable for any violations of the rights of the people of Namibia, or of its obligations under international law towards other States in respect of the exercise of its powers in relation to the Territory.

The member States of the United Nations are under obligation to recognize the illegality and invalidity of South Africa's continued presence in Namibia and to refrain from lending any support or any form of assistance to South Africa with reference to its occupation of Namibia. The precise determination of the acts permitted—what measures should be selected, what scope they should be given and by whom they should be applied—is a matter which lies within the competence of the appropriate political organs of the United Nations acting within their authority under the Charter. Thus it is for the Security Council to determine any further measures consequent upon the decisions already taken by it. The Court in consequence confines itself to giving advice on those dealings with the Government of South Africa which, under the Charter of the United Nations and general international law, should be considered as inconsistent with resolution 276 (1970) because they might imply recognizing South Africa's presence in Namibia as legal:

(a) Member States are under obligation (subject to (d) below) to abstain from entering into treaty relations with South Africa in all cases in which the Government of South Africa purports to act on behalf of or concerning Namibia. With respect to existing bilateral treaties member States must abstain from invoking or applying those treaties or provisions of treaties concluded by South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia which involve active intergovernmental co-operation. With respect to multilateral treaties, the same rule cannot be applied to certain general conventions such as those with humanitarian character, the non-performance of which may adversely affect the people of Namibia: it will be for the competent international organs to take specific measures in this respect.

(b) Member States are under obligation to abstain from sending diplomatic or special missions to South Africa including in their jurisdiction the territory of Namibia, to abstain from sending consular agents to Namibia, and to withdraw any such agents already there; and to make it clear to South Africa that the maintenance of diplomatic or consular relations does not imply any recognition of its authority with regard to Namibia.

(c) Member States are under obligation to abstain from entering into economic and other forms of relations with South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia which may entrench its authority over the territory.

(d) However, non-recognition should not result in depriving the people of Namibia of any advantages derived from international co-operation. In particular, the illegality or invalidity of acts performed by the Government of South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia after the termination of the Mandate cannot be extended to such acts as the registration of births, deaths and marriages.

As to States not members of the United Nations, although they are not bound by Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter, they have been called upon by resolution 276 (1970) to give assistance in the action which has been taken by the United Nations with regard to Namibia. In the view of the Court, the termination of the Mandate and the declaration of the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia are opposable to all States in the sense of barring erga omnes the legality of the situation which is maintained in violation of international law. In particular, no State which enters into relations with South Africa concerning Namibia may expect the United Nations or its Members to recognize the validity or effects of any such relationship. The Mandate having been terminated by a decision of the international organization in which the supervisory authority was vested, it is for non-member States to act accordingly. All States should bear in mind that the entity injured by the illegal presence of South Africa in Namibia is a people which must look to the international community for assistance in its progress towards the goals for which the sacred trust was instituted.

Accordingly, the Court has given the replies reproduced above on page 1.

Propositions by South Africa concerning the Supply of Further Factual Information and the Possible Holding of a Plebiscite
(paras. 128–132 of the Advisory Opinion)

The Government of South Africa had expressed the desire to supply the Court with further factual information concerning the purposes and objectives of its policy of separate development, contending that to establish a breach of its substantive international obligations under the Mandate it would be necessary to prove that South Africa had failed to exercise its powers with a view to promoting the well-being and progress of the inhabitants. The Court found that no factual evidence was needed for the purpose of determining whether the policy of apartheid in Namibia was in conformity with the international obligations assumed by South Africa. It is undisputed that the official governmental policy pursued by South Africa in Namibia is to achieve a complete physical separation of races and ethnic groups. This means the enforcement of distinctions, exclusions, restrictions and limitations exclusively based on grounds of race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin which constitute a denial of fundamental human rights. This the Court views as a fla-

Questions before the Court

1. Given that the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia is illegal, is South Africa under obligation to withdraw its administration from Namibia immediately and put an end to its occupation of the Territory?
2. Are the States Members of the United Nations under obligation to recognize the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia and the invalidity of its acts on behalf of or concerning Namibia, and to refrain from any acts and in particular any dealings with the Government of South Africa implying recognition of the legality of, or lending support or assistance to, such presence and administration?
3. Is it further incumbent upon States which are not Members of the United Nations to give assistance, within the scope of question two, in the action which has been taken by the United Nations with regard to Namibia.

Opinions of the Court

Advisory Opinion (Majority Opinion)

16

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

YEAR 1971

1971
21 June
General List
No. 53

21 June 1971

LEGAL CONSEQUENCES FOR STATES OF THE CONTINUED PRESENCE OF SOUTH AFRICA IN NAMIBIA (SOUTH WEST AFRICA) NOTWITHSTANDING SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 276 (1970)

Composition and competence of the Court—Propriety of the Court's giving the Opinion—Concept of mandates—Characteristics of the League of Nations Mandate for South West Africa—Situation on the dissolution of the League of Nations and the setting-up of the United Nations: survival of the Mandate and transference of supervision and accountability to the United Nations—Developments in the United Nations prior to the termination of the Mandate—Revocability of the Mandate—Termination of the Mandate by the General Assembly—Action in the Security Council and effect of Security Council resolutions leading to the request for Opinion—Requests by South Africa to supply further factual information and for the holding of a plebiscite—Legal consequences for States

ADVISORY OPINION

Present: President Sir Muhammad ZAFRULLA KHAN; Vice-President AMMOUN; Judges Sir Gerald FITZMAURICE, PADILLA NERVO, FORSTER, GROS, BENZON, PETRÉN, LACHS, ONYEAMA, DILLARD, IGNACIO-PINTO, DE CASTRO, MOROZOV, JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA; Registrar AQUARONE.

Concerning the legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa), notwithstanding Security Council resolution 276 (1970), composed as above,

4

THE COURT,

gives the following Advisory Opinion:

1. The question upon which the advisory opinion of the Court has been asked was laid before the Court by a letter dated 29 July 1970, filed in the Registry on 10 August, and addressed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the President of the Court. In his letter the Secretary-General informed the Court that, by resolution 284 (1970) adopted on 29 July 1970, certified true copies of the English and French texts of which were transmitted with his letter, the Security Council of the United Nations had decided to submit to the Court, with the request for an advisory opinion to be transmitted to the Security Council at an early date, the question set out in the resolution, which was in the following terms:

“The Security Council,

Reaffirming the special responsibility of the United Nations with regard to the territory and the people of Namibia,

Recalling Security Council resolution 276 (1970) on the question of Namibia,

Taking note of the report and recommendations submitted by the Ad Hoc Sub-Committee established in pursuance of Security Council resolution 276 (1970),

Taking further note of the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Sub-Committee on the possibility of requesting an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice,

Considering that an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice would be useful for the Security Council in its further consideration of the question of Namibia and in furtherance of the objectives the Council is seeking

1. Decides to submit in accordance with Article 96 (1) of the Charter, the following question to the International Court of Justice with the request for an advisory opinion which shall be transmitted to the Security Council at an early date:

‘What are the legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia, notwithstanding Security Council resolution 276 (1970)?’

2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution to the International Court of Justice, in accordance with Article 65 of the Statute of the Court, accompanied by all documents likely to throw light upon the question.”

2. On 5 August 1970, that is to say, after the despatch of the Secretary-General’s letter but before its receipt by the Registry, the English and French texts of resolution 284 (1970) of the Security Council were communicated to the President of the Court by telegram from the United Nations Secretariat. The President thereupon decided that the States Members of the United Nations were likely to be able to furnish information on the question, in accordance with Article 66, paragraph 2, of the Statute, and by an Order dated 5 August 1970, the President fixed 23 September 1970 as the time-limit within which the Court would be prepared to receive written statements from them. The same day, the Registrar sent to the States Members of the United Nations the special and direct communication provided for in Article 66 of the Statute.

3. The notice of the request for advisory opinion, prescribed by Article 66, paragraph 1, of the Statute, was given by the Registrar to all States entitled to appear before the Court by letter of 14 August 1970.

4. On 21 August 1970, the President decided that in addition to the States Members of the United Nations, the non-member States entitled to appear before the Court were also likely to be able to furnish information on the question. The same day the Registrar sent to those States the special and direct communication provided for in Article 66 of the Statute.

5. On 24 August 1970, a letter was received by the Registrar from the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of South Africa, whereby the Government of South Africa, for the reasons therein set out, requested the extension to 31 January 1971 of the time-limit for the submission of a written statement. The President of the Court, by an Order dated 28 August 1970, extended the time-limit for the submission of written statements to 19 November 1970.

6. The Secretary-General of the United Nations, in two instalments, and the following States submitted to the Court written statements or letters setting forth their views: Czechoslovakia, Finland, France, Hungary, India, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, South Africa, the United States of America, Yugoslavia. Copies of these communications were transmitted to all States entitled to appear before the Court, and to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and, in pursuance of Articles 44, paragraph 3, and 82, paragraph 1, of the Rules of Court, they were made accessible to the public as from 5 February 1971.

7. The Secretary-General of the United Nations, in pursuance of Article 65, paragraph 2, of the Statute transmitted to the Court a dossier of documents likely to throw light upon the question, together with an Introductory Note; these documents were received in the Registry in instalments between 5 November and 29 December 1970.

8. Before holding public sittings to hear oral statements in accordance with Article 66, paragraph 2, of the Statute, the Court had first to resolve two questions relating to its composition for the further proceedings.

9. In its written statement, filed on 19 November 1970, the Government of South Africa had taken objection to the participation of three Members of the Court in the proceedings. Its objections were based on statements made or other participation by the Members concerned, in their former capacity as representatives of their Governments, in United Nations organs which were dealing with matters concerning South West Africa. The Court gave careful consideration to the objections raised by the Government of South Africa, examining each case separately. In each of them the Court reached the conclusion that the participation of the Member concerned in his former capacity as representative of his Government, to which objection was taken in the South African Government's written statement, did not attract the application of Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court. In making Order No. 2 of 26 January 1971, the Court found no reason to depart in the present advisory proceedings from the decision adopted by the Court in the Order of 18 March 1965 in the South West Africa cases (Ethiopia v. South Africa; Liberia v. South Africa) after hearing the same contentions as have now been advanced by the Government of South Africa. In deciding the other two objections, the Court took into consideration that the activities in United Nations organs of the Members concerned, prior to their election to the Court, and which are referred to in the written statement of the Government of South Africa, do not furnish grounds for treating these objections differently from those raised in the application to which the Court decided not to accede in 1965, a decision confirmed by its Order No. 2 of 26 January 1971. With reference to Order No. 3 of the same date, the Court also took into consideration a circumstance to which its attention was drawn, although it was not mentioned in the written statement of the Government of South Africa, namely the participation of the Member concerned, prior to his election to the Court, in the formulation of Security Council resolution 246 (1968), which concerned the trial at Pretoria of thirty-seven South West Africans and which in its preamble took into account General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI). The Court considered that this participation of the Member concerned in the work of the United Nations, as a representative of his Government, did not justify a conclusion different from that already reached with regard to the objections raised by the Government of South Africa. Account must also be taken in this respect of precedents established by the present Court and the Permanent Court wherein judges sat in certain cases even though they had taken part in the formulation of texts the Court was asked to interpret. (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 1, p. 11; P.C.I.J., Series C, No. 84, p. 535; P.C.I.J., Series E, No. 4, p. 270; P.C.I.J., Series E, No. 8, p. 251.) After deliberation, the Court decided, by three Orders dated 26 January 1971, and made public on that date, not to accede to the objections which had been raised.

10. By a letter from the Secretary for Foreign Affairs dated 13 November 1970, the Government of South Africa made an application for the appointment of a judge ad hoc to sit in the proceedings, in terms of Article 31, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court. The Court decided, in accordance with the terms of Article 46 of the Statute of the Court, to hear the contentions of South Africa on this point in camera, and a closed hearing, at which representatives of India, the Netherlands, Nigeria and the United States of America were also present, was held for the purpose on 27 January 1971.

11. By an Order dated 29 January 1971, the Court decided to reject the application of the Government of South Africa. The Court thereafter decided that the record of the closed hearing should be made accessible to the public.

12. On 29 January 1971, the Court decided, upon the application of the Organization of African Unity, that that Organization was also likely to be able to furnish information on the question before the Court, and that the Court would therefore be prepared to hear an oral statement on behalf of the Organization.

13. The States entitled to appear before the Court had been informed by the Registrar on 27 November 1970 that oral proceedings in the case would be likely to open at the beginning of February 1971. On 4 February 1971, notification was given to those States which had expressed an intention to make oral statements, and to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, that 8 February had been fixed as the opening date. At 23 public sittings held between 8 February and 17 March 1971, oral statements were made to the Court by the following representatives:

for the Secretary-General of the United Nations:	Mr. C. A. Stavropoulos, Under-Secretary-General, Legal Counsel of the United Nations, and Mr. D. B. H. Vickers, Senior Legal Officer, Office of Legal Affairs; for Finland:	Mr. E. J. S. Castrén, Professor of International Law in the University of Helsinki; for the Organization of African Unity:	Mr. T. O. Elias, Attorney-General and Commissioner for Justice of Nigeria;
for India:	Mr. M. C. Chagla, M.P., Former Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Government of India;
for the Netherlands:	Mr. W. Riphagen, Legal Adviser to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs;
for Nigeria:	Mr. T. O. Elias, Attorney-General and Commissioner for Justice;
for Pakistan:	Mr. S. S. Pirzada, S.Pk., Attorney-General of Pakistan;
for South Africa:	Mr. J. D. Viall, Legal Adviser to the Department of Foreign Affairs, Mr. D. P. de Villiers, S.C., Advocate of the Supreme Court of South Africa, Mr. E. M. Grosskopf, S.C., Member of the South African Bar, Mr. H. J. O. van Heerden, Member of the South African Bar, Mr. R. F. Botha, Member of the South African Bar, Mr. M. Wiechers, Professor of Law in the University of South Africa;
for the Republic of Viet-Nam:	Mr. Le Tai Trien, Attorney-General, Supreme Court of Viet-Nam;
for the United States of America:	Mr. J. R. Stevenson, The Legal Adviser, Department of State.

14. Prior to the opening of the public sittings, the Court decided to examine first of all certain observations made by the Government of South Africa in its written statement, and in a letter dated 14 January 1971, in support of its submission that the Court should decline to give an advisory opinion.

15. At the opening of the public sittings on 8 February 1971, the President of the Court announced that the Court had reached a unanimous decision thereon. The substance of the submission of the Government of South Africa and the decision of the Court are dealt with in paragraphs 28 and 29 of the Advisory Opinion, below.

16. By a letter of 27 January 1971, the Government of South Africa had submitted a proposal to the Court regarding the holding of a plebiscite in the Territory of Namibia (South West Africa), and this proposal was elaborated in a further letter of 6 February 1971, which explained that the plebiscite was to determine whether it was the wish of the inhabitants "that the Territory should continue to be administered by the South African Government or should henceforth be administered by the United Nations".

17. At the hearing of 5 March 1971, the representative of South Africa explained further the position of his Government with regard to the proposed plebiscite, and indicated that his Government considered it necessary to adduce considerable evidence on the factual issues which it regarded as underlying the question before the Court. At the close of the hearing, on 17 March 1971, the President made the following statement:

“The Court has considered the request submitted by the representative of South Africa in his letter of 6 February 1971 that a plebiscite should be held in the Territory of Namibia (South West Africa) under the joint supervision of the Court and the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

The Court cannot pronounce upon this request at the present stage without anticipating, or appearing to anticipate, its decision on one or more of the main issues now before it. Consequently, the Court must defer its answer to this request until a later date.

The Court has also had under consideration the desire of the Government of the Republic to supply the Court with further factual material concerning the situation in Namibia (South West Africa). However, until the Court has been able first to examine some of the legal issues which must, in any event, be dealt with, it will not be in a position to determine whether it requires additional material on the facts. The Court must accordingly defer its decision on this matter as well.

If, at any time, the Court should find itself in need of further arguments or information, on these or any other matters, it will notify the governments and organizations whose representatives have participated in the oral hearings.”

18. On 14 May 1971 the President sent the following letter to the representatives of the Secretary-General, of the Organization of African Unity and of the States which had participated in the oral proceedings:

“I have the honour to refer to the statement which I made at the end of the oral hearing on the advisory proceedings relating to the Territory of Namibia (South West Africa) on 17 March last . . . , to the effect that the Court considered it appropriate to defer until a later date its decision regarding the requests of the Government of the Republic of South Africa (a) for the holding in that Territory of a plebiscite under the joint supervision of the Court and the Government of the Republic; and (b) to be allowed to supply the Court with further factual material concerning the situation there.

I now have the honour to inform you that the Court, having examined the matter, does not find itself in need of further arguments or information, and has decided to refuse both these requests.”

* * *

19. Before examining the merits of the question submitted to it the Court must consider the objections that have been raised to its doing so.

20. The Government of South Africa has contended that for several reasons resolution 284 (1970) of the Security Council, which requested the advisory opinion of the Court, is invalid, and that, therefore, the Court is not competent to deliver the opinion. A resolution of a properly constituted organ of the United Nations which is passed in accordance with that organ's rules of procedure, and is declared by its President to have been so passed, must be presumed to have been validly adopted. However, since in this instance the objections made concern the competence of the Court, the Court will proceed to examine them.

21. The first objection is that in the voting on the resolution two permanent members of the Security Council abstained. It is contended that the resolution was consequently not adopted by an affirmative vote of nine members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members, as required by Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter of the United Nations.

22. However, the proceedings of the Security Council extending over a long period supply abundant evidence that presidential rulings and the positions taken by members of the Council, in particular its permanent members, have consistently and uniformly interpreted the practice of voluntary abstention by a permanent member as not constituting a bar to the adoption of resolutions. By abstaining, a member does not signify its objection to the approval of what is being proposed; in order to prevent the adoption of a resolution requiring unanimity of the permanent members, a permanent member has only to cast a negative vote. This procedure followed by the Security Council, which has continued unchanged after the amendment in 1965 of Article 27 of the Charter, has been generally accepted by Members of the United Nations and evidences a general practice of that Organization.

23. The Government of South Africa has also argued that as the question relates to a dispute between South Africa and other Members of the United Nations, South Africa, as a Member of the United Nations, not a member of the Security Council and a party to a dispute, should have been invited under Article 32 of the Charter to participate, without vote, in the discussion relating to it. It further contended that the proviso at the end of Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter, requiring members of the Security Council which are parties to a dispute to abstain from voting, should have been complied with.

24. The language of Article 32 of the Charter is mandatory, but the question whether the Security Council must extend an invitation in accordance with that provision depends on whether it has made a determination that the matter under its consideration is in the nature of a dispute. In the absence of such a determination Article 32 of the Charter does not apply.

25. The question of Namibia was placed on the agenda of the Security Council as a "situation" and not as a "dispute". No member State made any suggestion or proposal that the matter should be examined as a dispute, although due notice was given of the placing of the question on the Security Council's agenda under the title "Situation in Namibia". Had the Government of South Africa considered that the question should have been treated in the Security Council as a dispute, it should have drawn the Council's attention to that aspect of the matter. Having failed to raise the question at the appropriate time in the proper forum, it is not open to it to raise it before the Court at this stage.

26. A similar answer must be given to the related objection based on the proviso to paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter. This proviso also requires for its application the prior determination by the Security Council that a dispute exists and that certain members of the Council are involved as parties to such a dispute.

* * *

27. In the alternative the Government of South Africa has contended that even if the Court had competence to give the opinion requested, it should nevertheless, as a matter of judicial propriety, refuse to exercise its competence.

28. The first reason invoked in support of this contention is the supposed disability of the Court to give the opinion requested by the Security Council, because of political pressure to which the Court, according to the Government of South Africa, has been or might be subjected.

29. It would not be proper for the Court to entertain these observations, bearing as they do on the very nature of the Court as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, an organ which, in that capacity, acts only on the basis of the law, independently of all outside influence or interventions whatsoever, in the exercise of the judicial function entrusted to it alone by the Charter and its Statute. A court functioning as a court of law can act in no other way.

30. The second reason advanced on behalf of the Government of South Africa in support of its contention that the Court should refuse to accede to the request of the Security Council is that the relevant legal question relates to an existing dispute between South Africa and other States. In this context it relies on the case of Eastern Carelia and argues that the Permanent Court of International Justice declined to rule upon the question referred to it because it was directly related to the main point of a dispute actually pending between two States.

31. However, that case is not relevant, as it differs from the present one. For instance one of the States concerned in that case was not at the time a Member of the League of Nations and did not appear before the Permanent Court. South Africa, as a Member of the United Nations, is bound by Article 96 of the Charter, which empowers the Security Council to request advisory opinions on any legal question. It has appeared before the Court, participated in both the written and oral proceedings and, while raising specific objections against the competence of the Court, has addressed itself to the merits of the question.

32. Nor does the Court find that in this case the Security Council's request relates to a legal dispute actually pending between two or more States. It is not the purpose of the request to obtain the assistance of the Court in the exercise of the Security Council's functions relating to the pacific settlement of a dispute pending before it between two or more States. The request is put forward by a United Nations organ with reference to its own decisions and it seeks legal advice from the Court on the consequences and implications of these decisions. This objective is stressed by the preamble to the resolution requesting the opinion, in which the Security Council has stated "that an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice would be useful for the Security Council in its further consideration of the question of Namibia and in furtherance of the objectives the Council is seeking". It is worth recalling that in its Advisory Opinion on Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the Court stated: "The object of this request for an Opinion is to guide the United Nations in respect of its own action" (I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 19).

33. The Court does not find either that in this case the advisory opinion concerns a dispute between South Africa and the United Nations. In the course of the oral proceedings Counsel for the Government of South Africa stated:

"... our submission is not that the question is a dispute, but that in order to answer the question the Court will have to decide legal and factual issues which are actually in dispute between South Africa and other States"

34. The fact that, in the course of its reasoning, and in order to answer the question submitted to it, the Court may have to pronounce on legal issues upon which radically divergent views exist between South Africa and the United Nations, does not convert the present case into a dispute nor bring it within the compass of Articles 82 and 83 of the Rules of Court. A similar position existed in the three previous advisory proceedings concerning South West Africa: in none of them did South Africa claim that there was a dispute, nor did the Court feel it necessary to apply the Rules of Court concerning "a legal question actually pending between two or more States". Differences of views among States on legal issues have existed in practically every advisory proceeding; if all were agreed, the need to resort to the Court for advice would not arise.

35. In accordance with Article 83 of the Rules of Court, the question whether the advisory opinion had been requested "upon a legal question actually pending between two or more States" was also of decisive importance in the Court's consideration of the request made by the Government of South Africa for the appointment of a judge ad hoc. As already indicated, the Court heard argument in support of that request and, after due deliberation, decided, by an Order of 29 January 1971, not to accede to it. This decision was based on the conclusion that the terms of the request for advisory opinion, the circumstances in which it had been submitted (which are described in para. 32 above), as well as the considerations set forth in paragraphs 33 and 34 above, were such as to preclude the interpretation that an opinion had been "requested upon a legal question actually pending between two or more States". Thus, in the opinion of the Court, South Africa was not entitled under Article 83 of the Rules of Court to the appointment of a judge ad hoc.

36. It has been urged that the possible existence of a dispute was a point of substance which was prematurely disposed of by the Order of 29 January 1971. Now the question whether a judge ad hoc should be appointed is of course a matter concerning the composition of the Bench and possesses, as the Government of South Africa recognized, absolute logical priority. It has to be settled prior to the opening of the oral proceedings, and indeed before any further issues, even of procedure, can be decided. Until it is disposed of the Court cannot proceed with the case. It is thus a logical necessity that any request for the appointment of a judge ad hoc must be treated as a preliminary matter on the basis of a prima facie appreciation of the facts and the law. This cannot be construed as meaning that the Court's decision thereon may involve the irrevocable disposal of a point of substance or of one related to the Court's competence. Thus, in a contentious case, when preliminary objections have been raised, the appointment of judges ad hoc must be decided before the hearing of those objections. That decision, however, does not prejudice the Court's competence if, for instance, it is claimed that no dispute exists. Conversely, to assert that the question of the judge ad hoc could not be validly settled until the Court had been able to analyse substantive issues is tantamount to suggesting that the composition of the Court could be left in suspense, and thus the validity of its proceedings left in doubt, until an advanced stage in the case.

37. The only question which was in fact settled with finality by the Order of 29 January 1971 was the one relating to the Court's composition for the purpose of the present case. That decision was adopted on the authority of Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Rules of Court and in accordance with Article 55, paragraph 1, of the Statute. Consequently, after the adoption of that decision, while differing views might still be held as to the applicability of Article 83 of the Rules of Court in the present case, the regularity of the composition of the Court for the purposes of delivering the present Advisory Opinion, in accordance with the Statute and the Rules of Court, is no longer open to question.

38. In connection with the possible appointment of judges ad hoc, it has further been suggested that the final clause in paragraph 1 of Article 82 of the Rules of Court obliges the Court to determine as a preliminary question whether the request relates to a legal question actually pending between two or more States. The Court cannot accept this reading, which overstrains the literal meaning of the words "avant tout". It is difficult to conceive that an Article providing general guidelines in the relatively unschematic context of advisory proceedings should prescribe a rigid sequence in the action of the Court. This is confirmed by the practice of the Court, which in no previous advisory proceedings has found it necessary to make an independent preliminary determination of this question or of its own competence, even when specifically requested to do so. Likewise, the interpretation of the Rules of Court as imposing a procedure in limine litis, which has been suggested, corresponds neither to the text of the Article nor to its purpose, which is to regulate advisory proceedings without impairing the flexibility which Articles 66, paragraph 4, and 68 of the Statute allow the Court so that it may adjust its procedure to the requirements of each particular case. The phrase in question merely indicates that the test of legal pendency is to be considered "above all" by the Court for the purpose of exercising the latitude granted by Article 68 of the Statute to be guided by the provisions which apply in contentious cases to the extent to which the Court recognizes them to be applicable. From a practical point of view it may be added that the procedure suggested, analogous to that followed in contentious procedure with respect to preliminary objections, would not have dispensed with the need to decide on the request for the appointment of a judge ad hoc as a previous, independent decision, just as in contentious cases the question of judges ad hoc must be settled before any hearings on the preliminary objections may be proceeded with. Finally, it must be observed that such proposed preliminary decision under Article 82 of the Rules of Court would not necessarily have predetermined the decision which it is suggested should have been taken subsequently under Article 83, since the latter provision envisages a more restricted hypothesis: that the advisory opinion is requested upon a legal question actually pending and not that it relates to such a question.

39. The view has also been expressed that even if South Africa is not entitled to a judge ad hoc as a matter of right, the Court should, in the exercise of the discretion granted by Article 68 of the Statute, have allowed such an appointment, in recognition of the fact that South Africa's interests are specially affected in the present case. In this connection the Court wishes to recall a decision taken by the Permanent Court at a time when the Statute did not include any provision concerning advisory opinions, the entire regulation of the procedure in the matter being thus left to the Court (P.C.I.J., Series E, No. 4, p. 76). Confronted with a request for the appointment of a judge ad hoc in a case in which it found there was no dispute, the Court, in rejecting the request, stated that “the decision of the Court must be in accordance with its Statute and with the Rules duly framed by it in pursuance of Article 30 of the Statute” (Order of 31 October 1935, P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 65, Annex 1, p. 69 at p. 70). It found further that the “exception cannot be given a wider application than is provided for by the Rules” (ibid., p. 71). In the present case the Court, having regard to the Rules of Court adopted under Article 30 of the Statute, came to the conclusion that it was unable to exercise discretion in this respect.

40. The Government of South Africa has also expressed doubts as to whether the Court is competent to, or should, give an opinion, if, in order to do so, it should have to make findings as to extensive factual issues. In the view of the Court, the contingency that there may be factual issues underlying the question posed does not alter its character as a “legal question” as envisaged in Article 96 of the Charter. The reference in this provision to legal questions cannot be interpreted as opposing legal to factual issues. Normally, to enable a court to pronounce on legal questions, it must also be acquainted with, take into account and, if necessary, make findings as to the relevant factual issues. The limitation of the powers of the Court contended for by the Government of South Africa has no basis in the Charter or the Statute.

41. The Court could, of course, acting on its own, exercise the discretion vested in it by Article 65, paragraph 1, of the Statute and decline to accede to the request for an advisory opinion. In considering this possibility the Court must bear in mind that: “A reply to a request for an Opinion should not, in principle, be refused.” (I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 19.) The Court has considered whether there are any “compelling reasons”, as referred to in the past practice of the Court, which would justify such a refusal. It has found no such reasons. Moreover, it feels that by replying to the request it would not only “remain faithful to the requirements of its judicial character” (I.C.J. Reports 1960, p. 153), but also discharge its functions as “the principal judicial organ of the United Nations” (Art. 92 of the Charter).

* * *

42. Having established that it is properly seised of a request for an advisory opinion, the Court will now proceed to an analysis of the question placed before it: “What are the legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia, notwithstanding Security Council resolution 276 (1970)?”

43. The Government of South Africa in both its written and oral statements has covered a wide field of history, going back to the origin and functioning of the Mandate. The same and similar problems were dealt with by other governments, the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in their written and oral statements.

44. A series of important issues is involved: the nature of the Mandate, its working under the League of Nations, the consequences of the demise of the League and of the establishment of the United Nations and the impact of further developments within the new organization. While the Court is aware that this is the sixth time it has had to deal with the issues involved in the Mandate for South West Africa, it has nonetheless reached the conclusion that it is necessary for it to consider and summarize some of the issues underlying the question addressed to it. In particular, the Court will examine the substance and scope of Article 22 of the League Covenant and the nature of "C" mandates.

45. The Government of South Africa, in its written statement, presented a detailed analysis of the intentions of some of the participants in the Paris Peace Conference, who approved a resolution which, with some alterations and additions, eventually became Article 22 of the Covenant. At the conclusion and in the light of this analysis it suggested that it was quite natural for commentators to refer to "C" mandates as being in their practical effect not far removed from annexation". This view, which the Government of South Africa appears to have adopted, would be tantamount to admitting that the relevant provisions of the Covenant were of a purely nominal character and that the rights they enshrined were of their very nature imperfect and unenforceable. It puts too much emphasis on the intentions of some of the parties and too little on the instrument which emerged from those negotiations. It is thus necessary to refer to the actual text of Article 22 of the Covenant, paragraph 1 of which declares:

"1. To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant."

As the Court recalled in its 1950 Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South-West Africa, in the setting-up of the mandates system "two principles were considered to be of paramount importance: the principle of non-annexation and the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form 'a sacred trust of civilization'" (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 131).

46. It is self-evident that the "trust" had to be exercised for the benefit of the peoples concerned, who were admitted to have interests of their own and to possess a potentiality for independent existence on the attainment of a certain stage of development: the mandates system was designed to provide peoples “not yet” able to manage their own affairs with the help and guidance necessary to enable them to arrive at the stage where they would be “able to stand by themselves”. The requisite means of assistance to that end is dealt with in paragraph 2 of Article 22:

“2. The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandatories on behalf of the League.”

This made it clear that those Powers which were to undertake the task envisaged would be acting exclusively as mandatories on behalf of the League. As to the position of the League, the Court found in its 1950 Advisory Opinion that: “The League was not, as alleged by [the South African] Government, a ‘mandator’ in the sense in which this term is used in the national law of certain States.” The Court pointed out that: “The Mandate was created, in the interest of the inhabitants of the territory, and of humanity in general, as an international institution with an international object—a sacred trust of civilisation.” Therefore, the Court found, the League “had only assumed an international function of supervision and control” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 132).

47. The acceptance of a mandate on these terms connoted the assumption of obligations not only of a moral but also of a binding legal character; and, as a corollary of the trust, “securities for [its] performance” were instituted (para. 7 of Art. 22) in the form of legal accountability for its discharge and fulfilment:

“7. In every case of mandate, the Mandatory shall render to the Council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.”

48. A further security for the performance of the trust was embodied in paragraph 9 of Article 22:

“9. A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.”

Thus the reply to the essential question, quis custodiet ipsos custodes?, was given in terms of the mandatory’s accountability to international organs. An additional measure of supervision was introduced by a resolution of the Council of the League of Nations, adopted on 31 January 1923. Under this resolution the mandatory Governments were to transmit to the League petitions from communities or sections of the populations of mandated territories.

49. Paragraph 8 of Article 22 of the Covenant gave the following directive:

“8. The degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.”

In pursuance of this directive, a Mandate for German South West Africa was drawn up which defined the terms of the Mandatory's administration in seven articles. Of these, Article 6 made explicit the obligation of the Mandatory under paragraph 7 of Article 22 of the Covenant by providing that “The Mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the Council, containing full information with regard to the territory, and indicating the measures taken to carry out the obligations assumed under Articles 2, 3, 4 and 5” of the Mandate. As the Court said in 1950: “the Mandatory was to observe a number of obligations, and the Council of the League was to supervise the administration and see to it that these obligations were fulfilled” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 132). In sum the relevant provisions of the Covenant and those of the Mandate itself preclude any doubt as to the establishment of definite legal obligations designed for the attainment of the object and purpose of the Mandate.

50. As indicated in paragraph 45 above, the Government of South Africa has dwelt at some length on the negotiations which preceded the adoption of the final version of Article 22 of the League Covenant, and has suggested that they lead to a different reading of its provisions. It is true that as that Government points out, there had been a strong tendency to annex former enemy colonial territories. Be that as it may, the final outcome of the negotiations, however difficult of achievement, was a rejection of the notion of annexation. It cannot tenably be argued that the clear meaning of the mandate institution could be ignored by placing upon the explicit provisions embodying its principles a construction at variance with its object and purpose.

51. Events subsequent to the adoption of the instruments in question should also be considered. The Allied and Associated Powers, in their Reply to Observations of the German Delegation, referred in 1919 to “the mandatory Powers, which in so far as they may be appointed trustees by the League of Nations will derive no benefit from such trusteeship”. As to the Mandate for South West Africa, its preamble recited that “His Britannic Majesty, for and on behalf of the Government of the Union of South Africa, has agreed to accept the Mandate in respect of the said territory and has undertaken to exercise it on behalf of the League of Nations”.

52. Furthermore, the subsequent development of international law in regard to non-self-governing territories, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, made the principle of self-determination applicable to all of them. The concept of the sacred trust was confirmed and expanded to all “territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government” (Art. 73). Thus it clearly embraced territories under a colonial régime. Obviously the sacred trust continued to apply to League of Nations mandated territories on which an international status had been conferred earlier. A further important stage in this development was the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960), which embraces all peoples and territories which “have not yet attained independence”. Nor is it possible to leave out of account the political history of mandated territories in general. All those which did not acquire independence, excluding Namibia, were placed under trusteeship. Today, only two out of fifteen, excluding Namibia, remain under United Nations tutelage. This is but a manifestation of the general development which has led to the birth of so many new States.

53. All these considerations are germane to the Court’s evaluation of the present case. Mindful as it is of the primary necessity of interpreting an instrument in accordance with the intentions of the parties at the time of its conclusion, the Court is bound to take into account the fact that the concepts embodied in Article 22 of the Covenant—“the strenuous conditions of the modern world” and “the well-being and development” of the peoples concerned—were not static, but were by definition evolutionary, as also, therefore, was the concept of the “sacred trust”. The parties to the Covenant must consequently be deemed to have accepted them as such. That is why, viewing the institutions of 1919, the Court must take into consideration the changes which have occurred in the supervening half-century, and its interpretation cannot remain unaffected by the subsequent development of law, through the Charter of the United Nations and by way of customary law. Moreover, an international instrument has to be interpreted and applied within the framework of the entire legal system prevailing at the time of the interpretation. In the domain to which the present proceedings relate, the last fifty years, as indicated above, have brought important developments. These developments leave little doubt that the ultimate objective of the sacred trust was the self-determination and independence of the peoples concerned. In this domain, as elsewhere, the corpus iuris gentium has been considerably enriched, and this the Court, if it is faithfully to discharge its functions, may not ignore.

54. In the light of the foregoing, the Court is unable to accept any construction which would attach to "C" mandates an object and purpose different from those of "A" or "B" mandates. The only differences were those appearing from the language of Article 22 of the Covenant, and from the particular mandate instruments, but the objective and safeguards remained the same, with no exceptions such as considerations of geographical contiguity. To hold otherwise would mean that territories under "C" mandate belonged to the family of mandates only in name, being in fact the objects of disguised cessions, as if the affirmation that they could "be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory" (Art. 22, para. 6) conferred upon the administering Power a special title not vested in States entrusted with "A" or "B" mandates. The Court would recall in this respect what was stated in the 1962 Judgment in the South West Africa cases as applying to all categories of mandate:

"The rights of the Mandatory in relation to the mandated territory and the inhabitants have their foundation in the obligations of the Mandatory and they are, so to speak, mere tools given to enable it to fulfil its obligations." (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 329.)

* * *

55. The Court will now turn to the situation which arose on the demise of the League and with the birth of the United Nations. As already recalled, the League of Nations was the international organization entrusted with the exercise of the supervisory functions of the Mandate. Those functions were an indispensable element of the Mandate. But that does not mean that the mandates institution was to collapse with the disappearance of the original supervisory machinery. To the question whether the continuance of a mandate was inseparably linked with the existence of the League, the answer must be that an institution established for the fulfilment of a sacred trust cannot be presumed to lapse before the achievement of its purpose. The responsibilities of both mandatory and supervisor resulting from the mandates institution were complementary, and the disappearance of one or the other could not affect the survival of the institution. That is why, in 1950, the Court remarked, in connection with the obligations corresponding to the sacred trust:

"Their raison d'être and original object remain. Since their fulfilment did not depend on the existence of the League of Nations, they could not be brought to an end merely because this supervisory organ ceased to exist. Nor could the right of the population to have the Territory administered in accordance with these rules depend thereon." (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 133.)

In the particular case, specific provisions were made and decisions taken for the transfer of functions from the organization which was to be wound up to that which came into being.

56. Within the framework of the United Nations an international trusteeship system was established and it was clearly contemplated that mandated territories considered as not yet ready for independence would be converted into trust territories under the United Nations international trusteeship system. This system established a wider and more effective international supervision than had been the case under the mandates of the League of Nations.

57. It would have been contrary to the overriding purpose of the mandates system to assume that difficulties in the way of the replacement of one régime by another designed to improve international supervision should have been permitted to bring about, on the dissolution of the League, a complete disappearance of international supervision. To accept the contention of the Government of South Africa on this point would have entailed the reversion of mandated territories to colonial status, and the virtual replacement of the mandates régime by annexation, so determinedly excluded in 1920.

58. These compelling considerations brought about the insertion in the Charter of the United Nations of the safeguarding clause contained in Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter, which reads as follows:

"1. Except as may be agreed upon in individual trusteeship agreements, made under Articles 77, 79 and 81, placing each territory under the trusteeship system, and until such agreements have been concluded, nothing in this Chapter shall be construed in or of itself to alter in any manner the rights whatsoever of any States or any peoples or the terms of existing international instruments to which Members of the United Nations may respectively be parties."

59. A striking feature of this provision is the stipulation in favour of the preservation of the rights of "any peoples", thus clearly including the inhabitants of the mandated territories and, in particular, their indigenous populations. These rights were thus confirmed to have an existence independent of that of the League of Nations. The Court, in the 1950 Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South-West Africa, relied on this provision to reach the conclusion that "no such rights of the peoples could be effectively safeguarded without international supervision and a duty to render reports to a supervisory organ” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 137). In 1956 the Court confirmed the conclusion that “the effect of Article 80 (1) of the Charter” was that of “preserving the rights of States and peoples” (I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 27).

60. Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter was thus interpreted by the Court as providing that the system of replacement of mandates by trusteeship agreements, resulting from Chapter XII of the Charter, shall not “be construed in or of itself to alter in any manner the rights whatsoever of any States or any peoples”.

61. The exception made in the initial words of the provision, “Except as may be agreed upon in individual trusteeship agreements, made under Articles 77, 79 and 81, placing each territory under the trusteeship system, and until such agreements have been concluded”, established a particular method for changing the status quo of a mandate régime. This could be achieved only by means of a trusteeship agreement, unless the “sacred trust” had come to an end by the implementation of its objective, that is, the attainment of independent existence. In this way, by the use of the expression “until such agreements have been concluded”, a legal hiatus between the two systems was obviated.

62. The final words of Article 80, paragraph 1, refer to “the terms of existing international instruments to which Members of the United Nations may respectively be parties”. The records of the San Francisco Conference show that these words were inserted in replacement of the words “any mandate” in an earlier draft in order to preserve “any rights set forth in paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations”.

63. In approving this amendment and inserting these words in the report of Committee II/4, the States participating at the San Francisco Conference obviously took into account the fact that the adoption of the Charter of the United Nations would render the disappearance of the League of Nations inevitable. This shows the common understanding and intention at San Francisco that Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter had the purpose and effect of keeping in force all rights whatsoever, including those contained in the Covenant itself, against any claim as to their possible lapse with the dissolution of the League.

64. The demise of the League could thus not be considered as an unexpected supervening event entailing a possible termination of those rights, entirely alien to Chapter XII of the Charter and not foreseen by the safeguarding provisions of Article 80, paragraph 1. The Members of the League, upon effecting the dissolution of that organization, did not declare, or accept even by implication, that the mandates would be cancelled or lapse with the dissolution of the League. On the contrary, paragraph 4 of the resolution on mandates of 18 April 1946 clearly assumed their continuation.

65. The Government of South Africa, in asking the Court to reappraise the 1950 Advisory Opinion, has argued that Article 80, paragraph 1, must be interpreted as a mere saving clause having a purely negative effect.

66. If Article 80, paragraph 1, were to be understood as a mere interpretative provision preventing the operation of Chapter XII from affecting any rights, then it would be deprived of all practical effect. There is nothing in Chapter XII—which, as interpreted by the Court in 1950, constitutes a framework for future agreements—susceptible of affecting existing rights of States or of peoples under the mandates system. Likewise, if paragraph 1 of Article 80 were to be understood as a mere saving clause, paragraph 2 of the same Article would have no purpose. This paragraph provides as follows:

“2. Paragraph 1 of this Article shall not be interpreted as giving grounds for delay or postponement of the negotiation and conclusion of agreements for placing mandated and other territories under the trusteeship system as provided for in Article 77.”

This provision was obviously intended to prevent a mandatory Power from invoking the preservation of its rights resulting from paragraph 1 as a ground for delaying or postponing what the Court described as “the normal course indicated by the Charter, namely, conclude Trusteeship Agreements” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 140). No method of interpretation would warrant the conclusion that Article 80 as a whole is meaningless.

67. In considering whether negative effects only may be attributed to Article 80, paragraph 1, as contended by South Africa, account must be taken of the words at the end of Article 76 (d) of the Charter, which, as one of the basic objectives of the trusteeship system, ensures equal treatment in commercial matters for all Members of the United Nations and their nationals. The proviso “subject to the provisions of Article 80” was included at the San Francisco Conference in order to preserve the existing right of preference of the mandatory Powers in “C” mandates. The delegate of the Union of South Africa at the Conference had pointed out earlier that “the ‘open door’ had not previously applied to the ‘C’ mandates”, adding that “his Government could not contemplate its application to their mandated territory”. If Article 80, paragraph 1, had no conservatory and positive effects, and if the rights therein preserved could have been extinguished with the disappearance of the League of Nations, then the proviso in Article 76 (d) in fine would be deprived of any practical meaning.

68. The Government of South Africa has invoked as “new facts” not fully before the Court in 1950 a proposal introduced by the Chinese delegation at the final Assembly of the League of Nations and another submitted by the Executive Committee to the United Nations Preparatory Commission, both providing in explicit terms for the transfer of supervisory functions over mandates from the League of Nations to United Nations organs. It is argued that, since neither of these two proposals was adopted, no such transfer was envisaged.

69. The Court is unable to accept the argument advanced. The fact that a particular proposal is not adopted by an international organ does not necessarily carry with it the inference that a collective pronouncement is made in a sense opposite to that proposed. There can be many reasons determining rejection or non-approval. For instance, the Chinese proposal, which was never considered but was ruled out of order, would have subjected mandated territories to a form of supervision which went beyond the scope of the existing supervisory authority in respect of mandates, and could have raised difficulties with respect to Article 82 of the Charter. As to the establishment of a Temporary Trusteeship Committee, it was opposed because it was felt that the setting up of such an organ might delay the negotiation and conclusion of trusteeship agreements. Consequently two United States proposals, intended to authorize this Committee to undertake the functions previously performed by the Mandates Commission, could not be acted upon. The non-establishment of a temporary subsidiary body empowered to assist the General Assembly in the exercise of its supervisory functions over mandates cannot be interpreted as implying that the General Assembly lacked competence or could not itself exercise its functions in that field. On the contrary, the general assumption appeared to be that the supervisory functions over mandates previously performed by the League were to be exercised by the United Nations. Thus, in the discussions concerning the proposed setting-up of the Temporary Trusteeship Committee, no observation was made to the effect that the League’s supervisory functions had not been transferred to the United Nations. Indeed, the South African representative at the United Nations Preparatory Commission declared on 29 November 1945 that “it seemed reasonable to create an interim body as the Mandates Commission was now in abeyance and countries holding mandates should have a body to which they could report”.

70. The Government of South Africa has further contended that the provision in Article 80, paragraph 1, that the terms of “existing international instruments” shall not be construed as altered by anything in Chapter XII of the Charter, cannot justify the conclusion that the duty to report under the Mandate was transferred from the Council of the League to the United Nations.

71. This objection fails to take into consideration Article 10 in Chapter IV of the Charter, a provision which was relied upon in the 1950 Opinion to justify the transference of supervisory powers from the League Council to the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Court then said:

“The competence of the General Assembly of the United Nations to exercise such supervision and to receive and examine reports is derived from the provisions of Article 10 of the Charter, which authorizes the General Assembly to discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the Charter and to make recommendations on these questions or matters to the Members of the United Nations.” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 137.)

72. Since a provision of the Charter—Article 80, paragraph 1—had maintained the obligations of the Mandatory, the United Nations had become the appropriate forum for supervising the fulfilment of those obligations. Thus, by virtue of Article 10 of the Charter, South Africa agreed to submit its administration of South West Africa to the scrutiny of the General Assembly, on the basis of the information furnished by the Mandatory or obtained from other sources. The transfer of the obligation to report, from the League Council to the General Assembly, was merely a corollary of the powers granted to the General Assembly. These powers were in fact exercised by it, as found by the Court in the 1950 Advisory Opinion. The Court rightly concluded in 1950 that—

“... the General Assembly of the United Nations is legally qualified to exercise the supervisory functions previously exercised by the League of Nations with regard to the administration of the Territory, and that the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to submit to supervision and control of the General Assembly and to render annual reports to it” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 137).

In its 1955 Advisory Opinion on Voting Procedure on Questions relating to Reports and Petitions concerning the Territory of South-West Africa, after recalling some passages from the 1950 Advisory Opinion, the Court stated:

“Thus, the authority of the General Assembly to exercise supervision over the administration of South-West Africa as a mandated Territory is based on the provisions of the Charter.” (I.C.J. Reports 1955, p. 76.)

In the 1956 Advisory Opinion on Admissibility of Hearings of Petitioners by the Committee on South West Africa, again after referring to certain passages from the 1950 Advisory Opinion, the Court stated:

As stated in the Court's 1962 Judgment:

"... the League of Nations in ending its own existence did not terminate the Mandates but ... definitely intended to continue them by its resolution of 18 April 1946" (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 334).

74. That the Mandate had not lapsed was also admitted by the Government of South Africa on several occasions during the early period of transition, when the United Nations was being formed and the League dissolved. In particular, on 9 April 1946, the representative of South Africa, after announcing his Government's intention to transform South West Africa into an integral part of the Union, declared before the Assembly of the League:

"In the meantime, the Union will continue to administer the territory scrupulously in accordance with the obligations of the Mandate, for the advancement and promotion of the interests of the inhabitants, as she has done during the past six years when meetings of the Mandates Commission could not be held.

The disappearance of those organs of the League concerned with the supervision of mandates, primarily the Mandates Commission and the League Council, will necessarily preclude complete compliance with the letter of the Mandate. The Union Government will nevertheless regard the dissolution of the League as in no way diminishing its obligations under the Mandate, which it will continue to discharge with the full and proper appreciation of its responsibilities until such time as other arrangements are agreed upon concerning the future status of the territory."

The Court referred to this statement in its Judgment of 1962, finding that "there could be no clearer recognition on the part of the Government of South Africa of the continuance of its obligations under the Mandate after the dissolution of the League of Nations" (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 340).

75. Similar assurances were given on behalf of South Africa in a memorandum transmitted on 17 October 1946 to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and in statements to the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly on 4 November and 13 November 1946. Referring to some of these and other assurances the Court stated in 1950: "These declarations constitute recognition by the Union Government of the continuance of its obligations under the Mandate and not a mere indication of the future conduct of that Government." (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 135.)

76. Even before the dissolution of the League, on 22 January 1946, the Government of the Union of South Africa had announced to the General Assembly of the United Nations its intention to ascertain the views of the population of South West Africa, stating that “when that had been done, the decision of the Union would be submitted to the General Assembly for judgment”. Thereafter, the representative of the Union of South Africa submitted a proposal to the Second Part of the First Session of the General Assembly in 1946, requesting the approval of the incorporation of South West Africa into the Union. On 14 December 1946 the General Assembly adopted resolution 65 (I) noting—

“... with satisfaction that the Union of South Africa, by presenting this matter to the United Nations, recognizes the interest and concern of the United Nations in the matter of the future status of territories now held under mandate” and declared that it was—“... unable to accede to the incorporation of the territory of South West Africa in the Union of South Africa”.

The General Assembly, the resolution went on,

“Recommends that the mandated territory of South West Africa be placed under the international trusteeship system and invites the Government of the Union of South Africa to propose for the consideration of the General Assembly a trusteeship agreement for the aforesaid Territory.”

A year later the General Assembly, by resolution 141 (II) of 1 November 1947, took note of the South African Government’s decision not to proceed with its plan for the incorporation of the Territory. As the Court stated in 1950:

“By thus submitting the question of the future international status of the Territory to the ‘judgment’ of the General Assembly as the ‘competent international organ’, the Union Government recognized the competence of the General Assembly in the matter.” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 142.)

77. In the course of the following years South Africa’s acts and declarations made in the United Nations in regard to South West Africa were characterized by contradictions. Some of these acts and declarations confirmed the recognition of the supervisory authority of the United Nations and South Africa’s obligations towards it, while others clearly signified an intention to withdraw such recognition. It was only on 11 July 1949 that the South African Government addressed to the Secretary-General a letter in which it stated that it could “no longer see that any real benefit is to be derived from the submission of special reports on South West Africa to the United Nations and [had] regretfully come to the conclusion that in the interests of efficient administration no further reports should be forwarded”.

78. In the light of the foregoing review, there can be no doubt that, as consistently recognized by this Court, the Mandate survived the demise of the League, and that South Africa admitted as much for a number of years. Thus the supervisory element, an integral part of the Mandate, was bound to survive, and the Mandatory continued to be accountable for the performance of the sacred trust. To restrict the responsibility of the Mandatory to the sphere of conscience or of moral obligation would amount to conferring upon that Power rights to which it was not entitled, and at the same time to depriving the peoples of the Territory of rights which they had been guaranteed. It would mean that the Mandatory would be unilaterally entitled to decide the destiny of the people of South West Africa at its discretion. As the Court, referring to its Advisory Opinion of 1950, stated in 1962:

“The findings of the Court on the obligation of the Union Government to submit to international supervision are thus crystal clear. Indeed, to exclude the obligations connected with the Mandate would be to exclude the very essence of the Mandate.” (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 334.)

79. The cogency of this finding is well illustrated by the views presented on behalf of South Africa, which, in its final submissions in the South West Africa cases, presented as an alternative submission, “in the event of it being held that the Mandate as such continued in existence despite the dissolution of the League of Nations”,

“... that the Respondent’s former obligations under the Mandate to report and account to, and to submit to the supervision, of the Council of the League of Nations, lapsed upon the dissolution of the League, and have not been replaced by any similar obligations relative to supervision by any organ of the United Nations or any other organization or body” (I.C.J. Reports 1966, p. 16).

The principal submission, however, had been:

“That the whole Mandate for South West Africa lapsed on the dissolution of the League of Nations and that Respondent is, in consequence thereof, no longer subject to any legal obligations thereunder.” (Ibid.)

80. In the present proceedings, at the public sitting of 15 March 1971, the representative of South Africa summed up his Government's position in the following terms:

“Our contentions concerning the falling away of supervisory and accountability provisions are, accordingly, absolute and unqualified. On the other hand, our contentions concerning the possible lapse of the Mandate as a whole are secondary and consequential and depend on our primary contention that the supervision and the accountability provisions fell away on the dissolution of the League.

In the present proceedings we accordingly make the formal submission that the Mandate has lapsed as a whole by reason of the falling away of supervision by the League, but for the rest we assume that the Mandate still continued . . .

. . . on either hypothesis we contend that after dissolution of the League there no longer was any obligation to report and account under the Mandate.”

He thus placed the emphasis on the “falling-away” of the “supervisory and accountability provisions” and treated “the possible lapse of the Mandate as a whole” as a “secondary and consequential” consideration.

81. Thus, by South Africa's own admission, “supervision and accountability” were of the essence of the Mandate, as the Court had consistently maintained. The theory of the lapse of the Mandate on the demise of the League of Nations is in fact inseparable from the claim that there is no obligation to submit to the supervision of the United Nations, and vice versa. Consequently, both or either of the claims advanced, namely that the Mandate has lapsed and/or that there is no obligation to submit to international supervision by the United Nations, are destructive of the very institution upon which the presence of South Africa in Namibia rests, for:

“The authority which the Union Government exercises over the Territory is based on the Mandate. If the Mandate lapsed, as the Union Government contends, the latter's authority would equally have lapsed. To retain the rights derived from the Mandate and to deny the obligations thereunder could not be justified.” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 133; cited in I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 333.)

82. Of this South Africa would appear to be aware, as is evidenced by its assertion at various times of other titles to justify its continued presence in Namibia, for example before the General Assembly on 5 October 1966:

“South Africa has for a long time contended that the Mandate is no longer legally in force, and that South Africa’s right to administer the Territory is not derived from the Mandate but from military conquest, together with South Africa’s openly declared and consistent practice of continuing to administer the Territory as a sacred trust towards the inhabitants.”

In the present proceedings the representative of South Africa maintained on 15 March 1971:

“. . . if it is accepted that the Mandate has lapsed, the South African Government would have the right to administer the Territory by reason of a combination of factors, being (a) its original conquest; (b) its long occupation; (c) the continuation of the sacred trust basis agreed upon in 1920; and, finally (d) because its administration is to the benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory and is desired by them. In these circumstances the South African Government cannot accept that any State or organization can have a better title to the Territory.”

83. These claims of title, which apart from other considerations are inadmissible in regard to a mandated territory, lead by South Africa’s own admission to a situation which vitiates the object and purpose of the Mandate. Their significance in the context of the sacred trust has best been revealed by a statement made by the representative of South Africa in the present proceedings on 15 March 1971: “it is the view of the South African Government that no legal provision prevents its annexing South West Africa.” As the Court pointed out in its Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South-West Africa, “the principle of non-annexation” was “considered to be of paramount importance” when the future of South West Africa and other territories was the subject of decision after the First World War (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 131). What was in consequence excluded by Article 22 of the League Covenant is even less acceptable today.

* * *

84. Where the United Nations is concerned, the records show that, throughout a period of twenty years, the General Assembly, by virtue of the powers vested in it by the Charter, called upon the South African Government to perform its obligations arising out of the Mandate. On 9 February 1946 the General Assembly, by resolution 9 (I), invited all States administering territories held under mandate to submit trusteeship agreements. All, with the exception of South Africa, responded by placing the respective territories under the trusteeship system or offering them independence. The General Assembly further made a special recommendation to this effect in resolution 65 (I) of 14 December 1946; on 1 November 1947, in resolution 141 (II), it "urged" the Government of the Union of South Africa to propose a trusteeship agreement; by resolution 227 (III) of 26 November 1948 it maintained its earlier recommendations. A year later, in resolution 337 (IV) of 6 December 1949, it expressed "regret that the Government of the Union of South Africa has withdrawn its previous undertaking to submit reports on its administration of the Territory of South West Africa for the information of the United Nations", reiterated its previous resolutions and invited South Africa "to resume the submission of such reports to the General Assembly". At the same time, in resolution 338 (IV), it addressed specific questions concerning the international status of South West Africa to this Court. In 1950, by resolution 449 (V) of 13 December, it accepted the resultant Advisory Opinion and urged the Government of the Union of South Africa "to take the necessary steps to give effect to the Opinion of the International Court of Justice". By the same resolution, it established a committee "to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the Advisory Opinion . . .". In the course of the ensuing negotiations South Africa continued to maintain that neither the United Nations nor any other international organization had succeeded to the supervisory functions of the League. The Committee, for its part, presented a proposal closely following the terms of the Mandate and providing for implementation "through the United Nations by a procedure as nearly as possible analogous to that which existed under the League of Nations, thus providing terms no more extensive or onerous than those which existed before". This procedure would have involved the submission by South Africa of reports to a General Assembly committee, which would further set up a special commission to take over the functions of the Permanent Mandates Commission. Thus the United Nations, which undoubtedly conducted the negotiations in good faith, did not insist on the conclusion of a trusteeship agreement; it suggested a system of supervision which "should not exceed that which applied under the Mandates System . . .". These proposals were rejected by South Africa, which refused to accept the principle of the supervision of its administration of the Territory by the United Nations.

85. Further fruitless negotiations were held from 1952 to 1959. In total, negotiations extended over a period of thirteen years, from 1946 to 1959. In practice the actual length of negotiations is no test of whether the possibilities of agreement have been exhausted; it may be sufficient to show that an early deadlock was reached and that one side adamantly refused compromise. In the case of Namibia (South West Africa) this stage had patently been reached long before the United Nations finally abandoned its efforts to reach agreement. Even so, for so long as South Africa was the mandatory Power the way was still open for it to seek an arrangement. But that chapter came to an end with the termination of the Mandate.

86. To complete this brief summary of the events preceding the present request for advisory opinion, it must be recalled that in 1955 and 1956 the Court gave at the request of the General Assembly two further advisory opinions on matters concerning the Territory. Eventually the General Assembly adopted resolution 2145 (XXI) on the termination of the Mandate for South West Africa. Subsequently the Security Council adopted resolution 276 (1970), which declared the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia to be illegal and called upon States to act accordingly.

* * *

87. The Government of France in its written statement and the Government of South Africa throughout the present proceedings have raised the objection that the General Assembly, in adopting resolution 2145 (XXI), acted ultra vires.

88. Before considering this objection, it is necessary for the Court to examine the observations made and the contentions advanced as to whether the Court should go into this question. It was suggested that though the request was not directed to the question of the validity of the General Assembly resolution and of the related Security Council resolutions, this did not preclude the Court from making such an enquiry. On the other hand it was contended that the Court was not authorized by the terms of the request, in the light of the discussions preceding it, to go into the validity of these resolutions. It was argued that the Court should not assume powers of judicial review of the action taken by the other principal organs of the United Nations without specific request to that effect, nor act as a court of appeal from their decisions.

89. Undoubtedly, the Court does not possess powers of judicial review or appeal in respect of the decisions taken by the United Nations organs concerned. The question of the validity or conformity with the Charter of General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) or of related Security Council resolutions does not form the subject of the request for advisory opinion. However, in the exercise of its judicial function and since objections have been advanced the Court, in the course of its reasoning, will consider these objections before determining any legal consequences arising from those resolutions.

90. As indicated earlier, with the entry into force of the Charter of the United Nations a relationship was established between all Members of the United Nations on the one side, and each mandatory Power on the other. The mandatory Powers while retaining their mandates assumed, under Article 80 of the Charter, vis-à-vis all United Nations Members, the obligation to keep intact and preserve, until trusteeship agreements were executed, the rights of other States and of the peoples of mandated territories, which resulted from the existing mandate agreements and related instruments, such as Article 22 of the Covenant and the League Council's resolution of 31 January 1923 concerning petitions. The mandatory Powers also bound themselves to exercise their functions of administration in conformity with the relevant obligations emanating from the United Nations Charter, which member States have undertaken to fulfil in good faith in all their international relations.

91. One of the fundamental principles governing the international relationship thus established is that a party which disowns or does not fulfil its own obligations cannot be recognized as retaining the rights which it claims to derive from the relationship.

92. The terms of the preamble and operative part of resolution 2145 (XXI) leave no doubt as to the character of the resolution. In the preamble the General Assembly declares itself "Convinced that the administration of the Mandated Territory by South Africa has been conducted in a manner contrary" to the two basic international instruments directly imposing obligations upon South Africa, the Mandate and the Charter of the United Nations, as well as to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In another paragraph of the preamble the conclusion is reached that, after having insisted with no avail upon performance for more than twenty years, the moment has arrived for the General Assembly to exercise the right to treat such violation as a ground for termination.

93. In paragraph 3 of the operative part of the resolution the General Assembly "Declares that South Africa has failed to fulfil its obligations in respect of the administration of the Mandated Territory and to ensure the moral and material well-being and security of the indigenous inhabitants of South West Africa and has, in fact, disavowed the Mandate". In paragraph 4 the decision is reached, as a consequence of the previous declaration "that the Mandate conferred upon His Britannic Majesty to be exercised on his behalf by the Government of the Union of South Africa is therefore terminated . . ." (Emphasis added.) It is this part of the resolution which is relevant in the present proceedings.

94. In examining this action of the General Assembly it is appropriate to have regard to the general principles of international law regulating termination of a treaty relationship on account of breach. For even if the mandate is viewed as having the character of an institution, as is maintained, it depends on those international agreements which created the system and regulated its application. As the Court indicated in 1962 "this Mandate, like practically all other similar Mandates" was "a special type of instrument composite in nature and instituting a novel international régime. It incorporates a definite agreement . . ." (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 331). The Court stated conclusively in that Judgment that the Mandate "... in fact and in law, is an international agreement having the character of a treaty or convention" (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 330). The rules laid down by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties concerning termination of a treaty relationship on account of breach (adopted without a dissenting vote) may in many respects be considered as a codification of existing customary law on the subject. In the light of these rules, only a material breach of a treaty justifies termination, such breach being defined as:

- “(a) a repudiation of the treaty not sanctioned by the present Convention; or
- (b) the violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object or purpose of the treaty” (Art. 60, para. 3).

95. General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) determines that both forms of material breach had occurred in this case. By stressing that South Africa “has, in fact, disavowed the Mandate”, the General Assembly declared in fact that it had repudiated it. The resolution in question is therefore to be viewed as the exercise of the right to terminate a relationship in case of a deliberate and persistent violation of obligations which destroys the very object and purpose of that relationship.

* * *

96. It has been contended that the Covenant of the League of Nations did not confer on the Council of the League power to terminate a mandate for misconduct of the mandatory and that no such power could therefore be exercised by the United Nations, since it could not derive from the League greater powers than the latter itself had. For this objection to prevail it would be necessary to show that the mandates system, as established under the League, excluded the application of the general principle of law that a right of termination on account of breach must be presumed to exist in respect of all treaties, except as regards provisions relating to the protection of the human person contained in treaties of a humanitarian character (as indicated in Art. 60, para. 5, of the Vienna Convention). The silence of a treaty as to the existence of such a right cannot be interpreted as implying the exclusion of a right which has its source outside of the treaty, in general international law, and is dependent on the occurrence of circumstances which are not normally envisaged when a treaty is concluded.

97. The Government of South Africa has contended that it was the intention of the drafters of the mandates that they should not be revocable even in cases of serious breach of obligation or gross misconduct on the part of the mandatory. This contention seeks to draw support from the fact that at the Paris Peace Conference a resolution was adopted in which the proposal contained in President Wilson's draft of the Covenant regarding a right of appeal for the substitution of the mandatory was not included. It should be recalled that the discussions at the Paris Peace Conference relied upon by South Africa were not directly addressed to an examination of President Wilson's proposals concerning the regulation of the mandates system in the League Covenant, and the participants were not contesting these particular proposals. What took place was a general exchange of views, on a political plane, regarding the questions of the disposal of the former German colonies and whether the principle of annexation or the mandatory principle should apply to them.

98. President Wilson's proposed draft did not include a specific provision for revocation, on the assumption that mandates were revocable. What was proposed was a special procedure reserving "to the people of any such territory or governmental unit the right to appeal to the League for the redress or correction of any breach of the mandate by the mandatory State or agency or for the substitution of some other State or agency, as mandatory". That this special right of appeal was not inserted in the Covenant cannot be interpreted as excluding the application of the general principle of law according to which a power of termination on account of breach, even if unexpressed, must be presumed to exist as inherent in any mandate, as indeed in any agreement.

99. As indicated earlier, at the Paris Peace Conference there was opposition to the institution of the mandates since a mandate would be inherently revocable, so that there would be no guarantee of long-term continuance of administration by the mandatory Power. The difficulties thus arising were eventually resolved by the assurance that the Council of the League would not interfere with the day-to-day administration of the territories and that the Council would intervene only in case of a fundamental breach of its obligations by the mandatory Power.

100. The revocability of a mandate was envisaged by the first proposal which was made concerning a mandates system:

"In case of any flagrant and prolonged abuse of this trust the population concerned should be able to appeal for redress to the League, who should in a proper case assert its authority to the full, even to the extent of removing the mandate and entrusting it to some other State if necessary." (J. C. Smuts, The League of Nations: A Practical Suggestion, 1918, pp. 21-22.)

Although this proposal referred to different territories, the principle remains the same. The possibility of revocation in the event of gross violation of the mandate was subsequently confirmed by authorities on international law and members of the Permanent Mandates Commission who interpreted and applied the mandates system under the League of Nations.

101. It has been suggested that, even if the Council of the League had possessed the power of revocation of the Mandate in an extreme case, it could not have been exercised unilaterally but only in co-operation with the mandatory Power. However, revocation could only result from a situation in which the Mandatory had committed a serious breach of the obligations it had undertaken. To contend, on the basis of the principle of unanimity which applied in the League of Nations, that in this case revocation could only take place with the concurrence of the Mandatory, would not only run contrary to the general principle of law governing termination on account of breach, but also postulate an impossibility. For obvious reasons, the consent of the wrongdoer to such a form of termination cannot be required.

102. In a further objection to General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) it is contended that it made pronouncements which the Assembly, not being a judicial organ, and not having previously referred the matter to any such organ, was not competent to make. Without dwelling on the conclusions reached in the 1966 Judgment in the South West Africa contentious cases, it is worth recalling that in those cases the applicant States, which complained of material breaches of substantive provisions of the Mandate, were held not to "possess any separate self-contained right which they could assert . . . to require the due performance of the Mandate in discharge of the 'sacred trust' " (I.C.J. Reports 1966, pp. 29 and 51). On the other hand, the Court declared that: ". . . any divergences of view concerning the conduct of a mandate were regarded as being matters that had their place in the political field, the settlement of which lay between the mandatory and the competent organs of the League" (ibid., p. 45). To deny to a political organ of the United Nations which is a successor of the League in this respect the right to act, on the argument that it lacks competence to render what is described as a judicial decision, would not only be inconsistent but would amount to a complete denial of the remedies available against fundamental breaches of an international undertaking.

103. The Court is unable to appreciate the view that the General Assembly acted unilaterally as party and judge in its own cause. In the 1966 Judgment in the South West Africa cases, referred to above, it was found that the function to call for the due execution of the relevant provisions of the mandate instruments appertained to the League acting as an entity through its appropriate organs. The right of the League "in the pursuit of its collective, institutional activity, to require the due performance of the Mandate in discharge of the 'sacred trust' ", was specifically recognized (ibid., p. 29). Having regard to this finding, the United Nations as a successor to the League, acting through its competent organs, must be seen above all as the supervisory institution, competent to pronounce, in that capacity, on the conduct of the mandatory with respect to its international obligations, and competent to act accordingly.

* * *

104. It is argued on behalf of South Africa that the consideration set forth in paragraph 3 of resolution 2145 (XXI) of the General Assembly, relating to the failure of South Africa to fulfil its obligations in respect of the administration of the mandated territory, called for a detailed factual investigation before the General Assembly could adopt resolution 2145 (XXI) or the Court pronounce upon its validity. The failure of South Africa to comply with the obligation to submit to supervision and to render reports, an essential part of the Mandate, cannot be disputed in the light of determinations made by this Court on more occasions than one. In relying on these, as on other findings of the Court in previous proceedings concerning South West Africa, the Court adheres to its own jurisprudence.

* * *

105. General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI), after declaring the termination of the Mandate, added in operative paragraph 4 "that South Africa has no other right to administer the Territory". This part of the resolution has been objected to as deciding a transfer of territory. That in fact is not so. The pronouncement made by the General Assembly is based on a conclusion, referred to earlier, reached by the Court in 1950:

"The authority which the Union Government exercises over the Territory is based on the Mandate. If the Mandate lapsed, as the Union Government contends, the latter's authority would equally have lapsed." (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 133.)

This was confirmed by the Court in its Judgment of 21 December 1962 in the South West Africa cases (Ethiopia v. South Africa; Liberia v. South Africa) (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 333). Relying on these decisions of the Court, the General Assembly declared that the Mandate having been terminated "South Africa has no other right to administer the Territory". This is not a finding on facts, but the formulation of a legal situation. For it would not be correct to assume that, because the General Assembly is in principle vested with recommendatory powers, it is debarred from adopting, in specific cases within the framework of its competence, resolutions which make determinations or have operative design.

* * *

106. By resolution 2145 (XXI) the General Assembly terminated the Mandate. However, lacking the necessary powers to ensure the withdrawal of South Africa from the Territory, it enlisted the co-operation of the Security Council by calling the latter's attention to the resolution, thus acting in accordance with Article 11, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

107. The Security Council responded to the call of the General Assembly. It "took note" of General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) in the preamble of its resolution 245 (1968); it took it "into account" in resolution 246 (1968); in resolutions 264 (1969) and 269 (1969) it adopted certain measures directed towards the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) and, finally, in resolution 276 (1970), it reaffirmed resolution 264 (1969) and recalled resolution 269 (1969).

108. Resolution 276 (1970) of the Security Council, specifically mentioned in the text of the request, is the one essential for the purposes of the present advisory opinion. Before analysing it, however, it is necessary to refer briefly to resolutions 264 (1969) and 269 (1969), since these two resolutions have, together with resolution 276 (1970), a combined and a cumulative effect. Resolution 264 (1969), in paragraph 3 of its operative part, calls upon South Africa to withdraw its administration from Namibia immediately. Resolution 269 (1969), in view of South Africa's lack of compliance, after recalling the obligations of Members under Article 25 of the Charter, calls upon the Government of South Africa, in paragraph 5 of its operative part, "to withdraw its administration from the territory immediately and in any case before 4 October 1969". The preamble of resolution 276 (1970) reaffirms General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI) and espouses it, by referring to the decision, not merely of the General Assembly, but of the United Nations "that the Mandate of South-West Africa was terminated". In the operative part, after condemning the non-compliance by South Africa with General Assembly and Security Council resolutions pertaining to Namibia, the Security Council declares, in paragraph 2, that "the continued presence of the South African authorities in Namibia is illegal" and that consequently all acts taken by the Government of South Africa "on behalf of or concerning Namibia after the termination of the Mandate are illegal and invalid". In paragraph 5 the Security Council "Calls upon all States, particularly those which have economic and other interests in Namibia, to refrain from any dealings with the Government of South Africa which are inconsistent with operative paragraph 2 of this resolution".

109. It emerges from the communications bringing the matter to the Security Council's attention, from the discussions held and particularly from the text of the resolutions themselves, that the Security Council, when it adopted these resolutions, was acting in the exercise of what it deemed to be its primary responsibility, the maintenance of peace and security, which, under the Charter, embraces situations which might to enforcement measures adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. It is not possible to find in the Charter any support for this view. Article 25 is not confined to decisions in regard to enforcement action but applies to "the decisions of the Security Council" adopted in accordance with the Charter. Moreover, that Article is placed, not in Chapter VII, but immediately after Article 24 in that part of the Charter which deals with the functions and powers of the Security Council. If Article 25 had reference solely to decisions of the Security Council concerning enforcement action under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter, that is to say, if it were only such decisions which had binding effect, then Article 25 would be superfluous, since this effect is secured by Articles 48 and 49 of the Charter.

114. It has also been contended that the relevant Security Council resolutions are couched in exhortatory rather than mandatory language and that, therefore, they do not purport to impose any legal duty on any State nor to affect legally any right of any State. The language of a resolution of the Security Council should be carefully analysed before a conclusion can be made as to its binding effect. In view of the nature of the powers under Article 25, the question whether they have been in fact exercised is to be determined in each case, having regard to the terms of the resolution to be interpreted, the discussions leading to it, the Charter provisions invoked and, in general, all circumstances that might assist in determining the legal consequences of the resolution of the Security Council.

115. Applying these tests, the Court recalls that in the preamble of resolution 269 (1969), the Security Council was "Mindful of its responsibility to take necessary action to secure strict compliance with the obligations entered into by States Members of the United Nations under the provisions of Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations". The Court has therefore reached the conclusion that the decisions made by the Security Council in paragraphs 2 and 5 of resolutions 276 (1970), as related to paragraph 3 of resolution 264 (1969) and paragraph 5 of resolution 269 (1969), were adopted in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter and in accordance with its Articles 24 and 25. The decisions are consequently binding on all States Members of the United Nations, which are thus under obligation to accept and carry them out.

116. In pronouncing upon the binding nature of the Security Council decisions in question, the Court would recall the following passage in its Advisory Opinion of 11 April 1949 on Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations:

"The Charter has not been content to make the Organization created by it merely a centre 'for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends' (Article 1, para. 4). It has equipped that centre with organs, and has given it special tasks. It has defined the position of the Members in relation to the Organization by requiring them to give it every assistance in any action undertaken by it (Article 2, para. 5), and to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council." (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 178.)

Thus when the Security Council adopts a decision under Article 25 in accordance with the Charter, it is for member States to comply with that decision, including those members of the Security Council which voted against it and those Members of the United Nations who are not members of the Council. To hold otherwise would be to deprive this principal organ of its essential functions and powers under the Charter.

* * *

117. Having reached these conclusions, the Court will now address itself to the legal consequences arising for States from the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia, notwithstanding Security Council resolution 276 (1970). A binding determination made by a competent organ of the United Nations to the effect that a situation is illegal cannot remain without consequence. Once the Court is faced with such a situation, it would be failing in the discharge of its judicial functions if it did not declare that there is an obligation, especially upon Members of the United Nations, to bring that situation to an end. As this Court has held, referring to one of its decisions declaring a situation as contrary to a rule of international law: "This decision entails a legal consequence, namely that of putting an end to an illegal situation" (I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 82).

118. South Africa, being responsible for having created and maintained a situation which the Court has found to have been validly declared illegal, has the obligation to put an end to it. It is therefore under obligation to withdraw its administration from the Territory of Namibia. By maintaining the present illegal situation, and occupying the Territory without title, South Africa incurs international responsibilities arising from a continuing violation of an international obligation. It also remains accountable for any violations of its international obligations, or of the rights of the people of Namibia. The fact that South Africa no longer has any title to administer the Territory does not release it from its obligations and responsibilities under international law towards other States in respect of the exercise of its powers in relation to this Territory. Physical control of a territory, and not sovereignty or legitimacy of title, is the basis of State liability for acts affecting other States.

119. The member States of the United Nations are, for the reasons given in paragraph 115 above, under obligation to recognize the illegality and invalidity of South Africa's continued presence in Namibia. They are also under obligation to refrain from lending any support or any form of assistance to South Africa with reference to its occupation of Namibia, subject to paragraph 125 below.

120. The precise determination of the acts permitted or allowed—what measures are available and practicable, which of them should be selected, what scope they should be given and by whom they should be applied—is a matter which lies within the competence of the appropriate political organs of the United Nations acting within their authority under the Charter. Thus it is for the Security Council to determine any further measures consequent upon the decisions already taken by it on the question of Namibia. In this context the Court notes that at the same meeting of the Security Council in which the request for advisory opinion was made, the Security Council also adopted resolution 283 (1970) which defined some of the steps to be taken. The Court has not been called upon to advise on the legal effects of that resolution.

121. The Court will in consequence confine itself to giving advice on those dealings with the Government of South Africa which, under the Charter of the United Nations and general international law, should be considered as inconsistent with the declaration of illegality and invalidity made in paragraph 2 of resolution 276 (1970), because they may imply a recognition that South Africa's presence in Namibia is legal.

122. For the reasons given above, and subject to the observations contained in paragraph 125 below, member States are under obligation to abstain from entering into treaty relations with South Africa in all cases in which the Government of South Africa purports to act on behalf of or concerning Namibia. With respect to existing bilateral treaties, member States must abstain from invoking or applying those treaties or provisions of treaties concluded by South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia which involve active intergovernmental co-operation. With respect to multilateral treaties, however, the same rule cannot be applied to certain general conventions such as those of a humanitarian character, the non-performance of which may adversely affect the people of Namibia. It will be for the competent international organs to take specific measures in this respect.

123. Member States, in compliance with the duty of non-recognition imposed by paragraphs 2 and 5 of resolution 276 (1970), are under obligation to abstain from sending diplomatic or special missions to South Africa including in their jurisdiction the Territory of Namibia, to abstain from sending consular agents to Namibia, and to withdraw any such agents already there. They should also make it clear to the South African authorities that the maintenance of diplomatic or consular relations with South Africa does not imply any recognition of its authority with regard to Namibia.

124. The restraints which are implicit in the non-recognition of South Africa's presence in Namibia and the explicit provisions of paragraph 5 of resolution 276 (1970) impose upon member States the obligation to abstain from entering into economic and other forms of relationship or dealings with South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia which may entrench its authority over the Territory.

125. In general, the non-recognition of South Africa's administration of the Territory should not result in depriving the people of Namibia of any advantages derived from international co-operation. In particular, while official acts performed by the Government of South Africa on behalf of or concerning Namibia after the termination of the Mandate are illegal and invalid, this invalidity cannot be extended to those acts, such as, for instance, the registration of births, deaths and marriages, the effects of which can be ignored only to the detriment of the inhabitants of the Territory.

126. As to non-member States, although not bound by Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter, they have been called upon in paragraphs 2 and 5 of resolution 276 (1970) to give assistance in the action which has been taken by the United Nations with regard to Namibia. In the view of the Court, the termination of the Mandate and the declaration of the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia are opposable to all States in the sense of barring erga omnes the legality of a situation which is maintained in violation of international law: in particular, no State which enters into relations with South Africa concerning Namibia may expect the United Nations or its Members to recognize the validity or effects of such relationship, or of the consequences thereof. The Mandate having been terminated by decision of the international organization in which the supervisory authority over its administration was vested, and South Africa's continued presence in Namibia having been declared illegal, it is for non-member States to act in accordance with those decisions.

127. As to the general consequences resulting from the illegal presence of South Africa in Namibia, all States should bear in mind that the injured entity is a people which must look to the international community for assistance in its progress towards the goals for which the sacred trust was instituted.

* * *

128. In its oral statement and in written communications to the Court, the Government of South Africa expressed the desire to supply the Court with further factual information concerning the purposes and objectives of South Africa's policy of separate development or apartheid, contending that to establish a breach of South Africa's substantive international obligations under the Mandate it would be necessary to prove that a particular exercise of South Africa's legislative or administrative powers was not directed in good faith towards the purpose of promoting to the utmost the well-being and progress of the inhabitants. It is claimed by the Government of South Africa that no act or omission on its part would constitute a violation of its international obligations unless it is shown that such act or omission was actuated by a motive, or directed towards a purpose other than one to promote the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory.

129. The Government of South Africa having made this request, the Court finds that no factual evidence is needed for the purpose of determining whether the policy of apartheid as applied by South Africa in Namibia is in conformity with the international obligations assumed by South Africa under the Charter of the United Nations. In order to determine whether the laws and decrees applied by South Africa in Namibia, which are a matter of public record, constitute a violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the question of intent or governmental discretion is not relevant; nor is it necessary to investigate or determine the effects of those measures upon the welfare of the inhabitants.

130. It is undisputed, and is amply supported by documents annexed to South Africa's written statement in these proceedings, that the official governmental policy pursued by South Africa in Namibia is to achieve a complete physical separation of races and ethnic groups in separate areas within the Territory. The application of this policy has required, as has been conceded by South Africa, restrictive measures of control officially adopted and enforced in the Territory by the coercive power of the former Mandatory. These measures establish limitations, exclusions or restrictions for the members of the indigenous population groups in respect of their participation in certain types of activities, fields of study or of training, labour or employment and also submit them to restrictions or exclusions of residence and movement in large parts of the Territory.

131. Under the Charter of the United Nations, the former Mandatory had pledged itself to observe and respect, in a territory having an international status, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race. To establish instead, and to enforce, distinctions, exclusions, restrictions and limitations exclusively based on grounds of race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin which constitute a denial of fundamental human rights is a flagrant violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter.

* * *

132. The Government of South Africa also submitted a request that a plebiscite should be held in the Territory of Namibia under the joint supervision of the Court and the Government of South Africa (para. 16 above). This proposal was presented in connection with the request to submit additional factual evidence and as a means of bringing evidence before the Court. The Court having concluded that no further evidence was required, that the Mandate was validly terminated and that in consequence South Africa's presence in Namibia is illegal and its acts on behalf of or concerning Namibia are illegal and invalid, it follows that it cannot entertain this proposal.

* * *

133. For these reasons,

THE COURT IS OF OPINION,

in reply to the question:

“What are the legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia, notwithstanding Security Council resolution 276 (1970)?”

by 13 votes to 2,

- (1) that, the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia being illegal, South Africa is under obligation to withdraw its administration from Namibia immediately and thus put an end to its occupation of the Territory;

by 11 votes to 4,

- (2) that States Members of the United Nations are under obligation to recognize the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia and the invalidity of its acts on behalf of or concerning Namibia, and to refrain from any acts and in particular any dealings with the Government of South Africa implying recognition of the legality of, or lending support or assistance to, such presence and administration;
- (3) that it is incumbent upon States which are not Members of the United Nations to give assistance, within the scope of subparagraph (2) above, in the action which has been taken by the United Nations with regard to Namibia.

Done in English and in French, the English text being authoritative, at the Peace Palace, The Hague, this twenty-first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and seventy-one, in two copies, one of which will be placed in the archives of the Court and the other transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

(Signed) ZAFRULLA KHAN, President.

(Signed) S. AQUARONE, Registrar.

President Sir Muhammad ZAFRULLA KHAN makes the following declaration:

I am in entire agreement with the Opinion of the Court but would wish to add some observations on two or three aspects of the presentation made to the Court on behalf of South Africa.

It was contended that under the supervisory system as devised in the Covenant of the League and the different mandate agreements, the mandatory could, in the last resort, flout the wishes of the Council of the League by casting its vote in opposition to the directions which the Council might propose to give to the mandatory. The argument runs that this system was deliberately so devised, with open eyes, as to leave the Council powerless in face of the veto of the mandatory if the latter chose to exercise it. In support of this contention reliance was placed on paragraph 5 of Article 4 of the Covenant of the League by virtue of which any Member of the League not represented on the Council was to be invited to send a representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the Council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that Member. This entitled the mandatory to sit as a member at any meeting of the Council in which a matter affecting its interests as a mandatory came under consideration. Under paragraph 1 of Article 5 of the Covenant decisions of the Council required the agreement of all the Members of the League represented at the meeting. This is known as the unanimity rule and by virtue thereof it was claimed that a mandatory possessed a right of veto when attending a meeting of the Council in pursuance of paragraph 5 of Article 4 and consequently the last word on the manner and method of the administration of the mandate rested with the mandatory. This contention is untenable. Were it well founded it would reduce the whole system of mandates to mockery. As the Court, in its Judgment of 1966, observed:

“In practice, the unanimity rule was frequently not insisted upon, or its impact was mitigated by a process of give-and-take, and by various procedural devices to which both the Council and the mandatories lent themselves. So far as the Court’s information goes, there never occurred any case in which a mandatory ‘vetoed’ what would otherwise have been a Council decision. Equally, however, much trouble was taken to avoid situations in which the mandatory would have been forced to acquiesce in the views of the rest of the Council short of casting an adverse vote. The occasional deliberate absence of the mandatory from a meeting, enabled decisions to be taken that the mandatory might have felt obliged to vote against if it had been present. This was part of the above-mentioned process for arriving at generally acceptable conclusions.”
(I.C.J. Reports 1966, pp. 44-45.)

The representative of South Africa, in answer to a question by a Member of the Court, confessed that there was not a single case on record in which the representative of a mandatory Power ever cast a negative vote in a meeting of the Council so as to block a decision of the Council. It is thus established that in practice the last word always rested with the Council of the League and not with the mandatory.

The Covenant of the League made ample provision to secure the effectiveness of the Covenant and conformity to its provisions in respect of the obligations entailed by membership of the League. A Member of the League which had violated any covenant of the League could be declared to be no longer a Member of the League by a vote of the Council concurred in by the representatives of all the other Members of the League represented thereon (para. 4, Art. 16, of the Covenant).

The representative of South Africa conceded that:

“ . . . if a conflict between a mandatory and the Council occurred and if all the Members of the Council were of the opinion that the mandatory had violated a covenant of the League, it would have been legally possible for the Council to expel the mandatory from the League and thereafter decisions of the Council could no longer be thwarted by the particular mandatory—for instance, a decision to revoke the mandate. The mandatory would then no longer be a Member of the League and would then accordingly no longer be entitled to attend and vote in Council meetings.

. . . we agree that by expelling a mandatory the Council could have overcome the practical or mechanical difficulties created by the unanimity requirement.” (Hearing of 15 March 1971.)

It was no doubt the consciousness of this position which prompted the deliberate absence of a mandatory from a meeting of the Council of the League which enabled the Council to take decisions that the mandatory might have felt obliged to vote against if it had been present.

If a mandatory ceased to be a Member of the League and the Council felt that the presence of its representative in a meeting of the Council dealing with matters affecting the mandate would be helpful, it could still be invited to attend as happened in the case of Japan after it ceased to be a Member of the League. But it could not attend as of right under paragraph 5 of Article 4 of the Covenant.

In addition, if need arose the Covenant could be amended under Article 26 of the Covenant. In fact no such need arose but the authority was provided in the Covenant. It would thus be idle to contend that the mandates system was deliberately devised, with open eyes, so as to leave the Council of the League powerless against the veto of the mandatory if the latter chose to exercise it.

Those responsible for the Covenant were anxious and worked hard to institute a system which would be effective in carrying out to the full the sacred trust of civilization. Had they deliberately devised a framework which might enable a mandatory so inclined to defy the system with impunity, they would have been guilty of defeating the declared purpose of the mandates system and this is not to be thought of; nor is it to be imagined that these wise statesmen, despite all the care that they took and the reasoning and persuasion that they brought into play, were finally persuaded into accepting as reality that which could so easily be turned into a fiction.

* * *

In my view the supervisory authority of the General Assembly of the United Nations in respect of the mandated territory, being derived from the Covenant of the League and the Mandate Agreement, is not restricted by any provision of the Charter of the United Nations. The extent of that authority must be determined by reference to the relevant provisions of the Covenant of the League and the Mandate Agreement. The General Assembly was entitled to exercise the same authority in respect of the administration of the Territory by the Mandatory as was possessed by the Council of the League and its decisions and determinations in that respect had the same force and effect as the decisions and determinations of the Council of the League. This was well illustrated in the case of General Assembly resolution 289 (IV), adopted on 21 November 1949 recommending that Libya shall become independent as soon as possible and in any case not later than 1 January 1952. A detailed procedure for the achievement of this objective was laid down, including the appointment by the General Assembly of a United Nations Commissioner in Libya and a Council to aid and advise him, etc. All the recommendations contained in this resolution constituted binding decisions; decisions which had been adopted in accordance with the provisions of the Charter but whose binding character was derived from Annex XI to the Treaty of Peace with Italy.

* * *

The representative of South Africa, during the course of his oral submission, refrained from using the expression "apartheid" but urged:

"... South Africa is in the position that its conduct would be unlawful if the differentiation which it admittedly practises should be directed at, and have the result of subordinating the interests of one or certain groups on a racial or ethnic basis to those of others, . . . If that can be established in fact, then South Africa would be guilty of violation of its obligations in that respect, otherwise not." (Hearing of 17 March 1971.)

The policy of apartheid was initiated by Prime Minister Malan and was then vigorously put into effect by his successors, Strijdom and Verwoerd. It has been continuously proclaimed that the purpose and object of the policy are the maintenance of White domination. Speaking to the South African House of Assembly, as late as 1963, Dr. Verwoerd said:

“Reduced to its simplest form the problem is nothing else than this: We want to keep South Africa White . . . Keeping it White can only mean one thing, namely, White domination, not leadership, not guidance, but control, supremacy. If we are agreed that it is the desire of the people that the White man should be able to continue to protect himself by White domination . . . we say that it can be achieved by separate development.” (I.C.J. Pleadings, South West Africa, Vol. IV, p. 264.)

South Africa's reply to this in its Rejoinder in the 1966 cases was in effect that these and other similar pronouncements were qualified by “the promise to provide separate homelands for the Bantu groups” wherein the Bantu would be free to develop his capacities to the same degree as the White could do in the rest of the country. But this promise itself was always subject to the qualification that the Bantu homelands would develop under the guardianship of the White. In this connection it was urged that in 1961 the “Prime Minister spoke of a greater degree of ultimate independence for Bantu homelands than he had mentioned a decade earlier”. This makes little difference in respect of the main purpose of the policy which continued to be the domination of the White.

It needs to be remembered, however, that the Court is not concerned in these proceedings with conditions in South Africa. The Court is concerned with the administration of South West Africa as carried on by the Mandatory in discharge of his obligations under the Mandate which prescribed that the well-being and development of people who were not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world constituted a sacred trust of civilization and that the best method of giving effect to this principle was that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who, by reason of their resources, their experience and their geographical position could best undertake this responsibility (Art. 22, paras. 1 and 2, of the Covenant of the League of Nations).

The administration was to be carried on “in the interests of the indigenous population” (para. 6, Art. 22). For the discharge of this obligation it is not enough that the administration should believe in good faith that the policy it proposes to follow is in the best interests of all sections of the population. The supervisory authority must be satisfied that it is in the best interests of the indigenous population of the Territory. This follows from Article 6 of the Mandate Agreement for South West Africa, read with paragraph 6 of Article 22 of the Covenant.

The representative of South Africa, while admitting the right of the people of South West Africa to self-determination, urged in his oral statement that the exercise of that right must take into full account the limitations imposed, according to him, on such exercise by the tribal and cultural divisions in the Territory. He concluded that in the case of South West Africa self-determination "may well find itself practically restricted to some kind of autonomy and local self-government within a larger arrangement of co-operation" (hearing of 17 March 1971). This in effect means a denial of self-determination as envisaged in the Charter of the United Nations.

Whatever may have been the conditions in South Africa calling for special measures, those conditions did not exist in the case of South West Africa at the time when South Africa assumed the obligation of a mandatory in respect of the Territory, nor have they come into existence since. In South West Africa the small White element was not and is not indigenous to the Territory. There can be no excuse in the case of South West Africa for the application of the policy of apartheid so far as the interests of the White population are concerned. It is claimed, however, that the various indigenous groups of the population have reached different stages of development and that there are serious ethnic considerations which call for the application of the policy of separate development of each group. The following observations of the Director of the Institute of Race Relations, London, are apposite in this context:

"... White South African arguments are based on the different stages of development reached by various groups of people. It is undisputed fact that groups have developed at different paces in respect of the control of environment (although understanding of other aspects of life has not always grown at the same pace). But the aspect of South African thought which is widely questioned elsewhere is the assumption that an individual is permanently limited by the limitations of his group. His ties with it may be strong; indeed, when considering politics and national survival, the assumption that they will be strong is altogether reasonable. Again, as a matter of choice, people may prefer to mix socially with those of their own group, but to say that by law people of one group must mix with no others can really only proceed from a conviction not only that the other groups are inferior but that every member of each of the other groups is permanently and irremediably inferior. It is this that rankles. 'Separate but equal' is possible so long as it is a matter of choice by both parties; legally imposed by one, it must be regarded by the other as a humiliation, and far more so if it applies not only to the group as a whole but to individuals. In fact, of course, what separate development has meant has been anything but equal.

These are some reasons why it will be hard to find natives of Africa who believe that to extend the policy of separate development to South West Africa even more completely than at present is in the interest of any but the White inhabitants." (Quoted in I.C.J. Pleadings, South West Africa, Vol. IV, p. 339.)

* * *

Towards the close of his oral presentation the representative of South Africa made a plea to the Court in the following terms:

"In our submission, the general requirement placed by the Charter on all United Nations activities is that they must further peace, friendly relations, and co-operation between nations, and especially between member States. South Africa, as a member State, is under a duty to contribute towards those ends, and she desires to do so, although she has no intention of abdicating what she regards as her responsibilities on the sub-continent of southern Africa.

If there are to be genuine efforts at achieving a peaceful solution, they will have to satisfy certain criteria. They will have to respect the will of the self-determining peoples of South West Africa. They will have to take into account the facts of geography, of economics, of budgetary requirements, of the ethnic conditions and of the state of development.

If this Court, even in an opinion on legal questions, could indicate the road towards a peaceful and constructive solution along these lines, then the Court would have made a great contribution, in our respectful submission, to the cause of international peace and security and, more, to the cause of friendly relations amongst not only the nations but amongst all men." (Hearing of 5 March 1971.)

The representative of the United States of America, in his oral presentation, observed that:

"... the question of holding a free and proper plebiscite under appropriate auspices and with conditions and arrangements which would ensure a fair and informed expression of the will of the people of Namibia deserves study. It is a matter which might be properly submitted to the competent political organs of the United Nations, which have consistently manifested their concern that the Namibians achieve self-determination. The Court may wish to so indicate in its opinion to the Security Council.” (Hearing of 9 March 1971.)

The Court having arrived at the conclusion that the Mandate has been terminated and that the presence of South Africa in South West Africa is illegal, I would, in response to the plea made by the representative of South Africa, suggest that South Africa should offer to withdraw its administration from South West Africa in consultation with the United Nations so that a process of withdrawal and substitution in its place of United Nations’ control may be agreed upon and carried into effect with the minimum disturbance of present administrative arrangements. It should also be agreed upon that, after the expiry of a certain period but not later than a reasonable time-limit thereafter, a plebiscite may be held under the supervision of the United Nations, which should ensure the freedom and impartiality of the plebiscite, to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants of the Territory with regard to their political future. If the result of the plebiscite should reveal a clear preponderance of views in support of a particular course and objective, that course should be adopted so that the desired objective may be achieved as early as possible.

South Africa’s insistence upon giving effect to the will of the peoples of South West Africa proceeds presumably from the conviction that an overwhelming majority of the peoples of the Territory desire closer political integration with the Republic of South Africa. Should that prove in fact to be the case the United Nations, being wholly committed to the principle of self-determination of peoples, would be expected to readily give effect to the clearly expressed wishes of the peoples of the Territory. Should the result of the plebiscite disclose their preference for a different solution, South Africa should equally readily accept and respect such manifestation of the will of the peoples concerned and should co-operate with the United Nations in giving effect to it.

The Government of South Africa, being convinced that an overwhelming majority of the peoples of South West Africa truly desire incorporation with the Republic, would run little risk of a contrary decision through the adoption of the procedure here suggested. If some such procedure is adopted and the conclusion that may emerge therefrom, whatever it may prove to be, is put into effect, South Africa would have vindicated itself in the eyes of the world and in the estimation of the peoples of South West Africa, whose freely expressed wishes must be supreme. There would still remain the possibility, and, if South Africa’s estimation of the situation is close enough to reality, the strong probability, that once the peoples of South West Africa have been put in a position to manage their own affairs without any outside influence or control and they have had greater experience of the difficulties and problems with which they would be confronted, they may freely decide, in the exercise of their sovereignty, to establish a closer political relationship with South Africa. The adoption of the course here suggested would indeed make a great contribution “to the cause of international peace and security and, more, to the cause of friendly relations amongst not only the nations but amongst all men”.

Vice-President AMMOUN and Judges PADILLA NERVO, PETRÉN, ONYEAMA, DILLARD and DE CASTRO append separate opinions to the Opinion of the Court.

Judges Sir Gerald FITZMAURICE and GROS append dissenting opinions to the Opinion of the Court.

(Initialed) Z.K.

(Initialed) S.A.

Dissenting Opinion (Judge Gros)

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE GROS

[Translation]

To my regret, I am unable to concur in the Advisory Opinion, whether in regard to the substance or in regard to certain problems of a preliminary character, and I propose to explain my disagreement below.

1. By way of preliminary decision, the Court made four Orders on questions concerning its composition, and as I voted against two of them I should give my reasons for doing so. The first concerned is Order No. 3 of 26 January 1971, which, having regard to Article 48 of the Statute, rejected by 10 votes to 4 an objection raised against a Member of the Court, but gave no reasons. The second Order on which I have to comment is that of 29 January 1971, which, having regard to Articles 31 and 68 of the Statute and Article 83 of the Rules of Court, rejected by 10 votes to 5 a request by the Government of South Africa for the appointment of a judge ad hoc; it likewise gave no reasons, and it was accompanied by two joint declarations, one made by three and the other by two Members of the Court.

2. The Court has said: "The Court itself, and not the parties, must be the guardian of the Court's judicial integrity" (I.C.J. Reports 1963, p. 29). Even if one of the Governments represented in the proceedings had not raised the problem decided by Order No. 3 of 26 January 1971, the Court would have been obliged to examine it in the application of its Statute. The observance of the provisions of its own Statute is a strict obligation, as the Court's 1963 decision emphasizes.

3. At the meeting of the Security Council on 4 March 1968, the representative of Pakistan, speaking on behalf of the co-sponsors of draft resolution S/8429 on Namibia, which was to become Security Council resolution 246 (1968), stated:

"The seven co-sponsors acknowledge with gratitude the constructive co-operation extended to them by Mr. . . . and Mr. . . . and the great contribution which they made to the formulation of the draft resolution" (S/PV. 1395, p. 32).

The first person mentioned has since become a Member of the Court; now, resolution 246 (1968) of 14 March 1968, in its preamble, takes into account the General Assembly resolution, 2145 (XXI), "by which the General Assembly of the United Nations terminated the Mandate of South Africa over South West Africa and assumed direct responsibility for the territory until its independence" (14 March 1968, S/PV. 1397, pp. 6-10). The records likewise contain summaries of several speeches, some of them lengthy, which that same person made on the substantive problem now decided by the Court (see S/PV. 1387, pp. 61-66; S/PV. 1395, pp. 41 and 43-45; S/PV. 1397, pp. 16-20).

4. Such are the facts. Hitherto it has been the practice of the Court to determine in each case of this kind whether Article 17 of the Statute was applicable and to ascertain whether there had been any active participation on the part of a Member, before his election, in a question laid before the Court (cf. Stauffenberg, Statut et Règlement de la Cour permanente de Justice internationale, 1934, p. 76, citing a decision of the Permanent Court, taken at its twentieth session in which the material point was that a Member had not played an "active part" in the treatment of the question by the Council of the League). It was in application of that principle that one Member of the Court decided not to sit in the case concerning the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company because he had represented his country in the Security Council when it had been considering a matter arising out of the claim of the United Kingdom against Iran, and that the Court expressed its agreement with that decision (I.C.J. Yearbook 1963-1964, p. 100).

No reader of the records I have cited in paragraph 3 can be left in any doubt as to the character and substance of the positions adopted by the then representative, now a judge, on the question of the revocation of the Mandate by the effect of resolution 2145 (XXI). Yet that resolution is the fundamental problem of the present proceedings, inasmuch as they are concerned with the determination of its legal consequences. It must therefore be noted that Order No. 3 of 26 January 1971 marked a change in practice, and that the Court has discarded the criterion of active participation.

It was indeed, in the present case, no participation in the drafting of a general convention that had to be considered, but the expression of opinion on the international status of the Mandate after and in function of the declaration of revocation by resolution 2145 (XXI), which is the underlying legal point of the proceedings. Thus we see that the representative in the Security Council pronounced upon the substance of the case after the critical date of October 1966. There is therefore no comparison with certain precedents cited in the Advisory Opinion (para. 9), which are instances of judges having contributed to the drafting of international treaties applicable in cases which arose much later and in which they had taken no part.

The Court's decision contradicts the principle, to which Article 17 of the Statute lends formal expression, that a Member must not participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken part in some other capacity. This Article, moreover, is an application of a generally accepted principle of judicial organization deriving from an obvious concern for justice. The new interpretation which has been placed upon it cannot, therefore, be justified.

5. I have now to explain why I consider that Article 68 of the Statute and Articles 82 and 83 of the Rules ought to have been given a different application from the one chosen by the Court in adopting the Order of 29 January 1971.

The Order of 29 January 1971 rejecting the request for a judge ad hoc was made after a closed hearing, held on 27 January, at which the observations of the South African Government were heard. Judge Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, Judge Petró and I reserved the right to make known the reasons for our dissent, which, inasmuch as they concerned the substance from certain aspects, could not be disclosed at the moment when the Order which discounted them was issued. The Court gave definitive shape to its interpretation of the relevant articles of the Statute and Rules by refusing the appointment of a judge ad hoc—a question which it thus made irreversible—without, however, disclosing any reasons for the Order embodying the decision. In that this was an interpretation of rules which are binding on the Court, it is necessary to examine the reasons for it.

The refusal of a judge ad hoc is justified only if the legal conditions for the exercise of the faculty to request such an appointment have not been satisfied. The Court has not, in effect, any freedom of choice in the matter for Article 83 of the Rules expressly provides that if “a legal question actually pending between two or more States” is involved in proceedings on a request for advisory opinion, the Court is to apply Article 31 of the Statute, which concerns the appointment of a judge ad hoc on the application of a State not represented on the Bench. Furthermore, the Court ought to have pronounced upon this legal problem “avant tout” [“above all”] (Rules, Art. 82), but this it failed to do, not treating the question as a preliminary one to be thrashed out in full cognizance of all the factors concerned, including those related to questions of substance. Needless to say, the idea of a preliminary question is nothing new in advisory procedure, and it would have been natural, in view of the particular circumstances of the case, to adopt on this point an approach analogous to that of contentious procedure, as is recommended by Article 68 of the Statute. This is a point with which the Court had to deal, for example, in connection with its Advisory Opinion on Judgments of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO upon Complaints Made against Unesco (I.C.J. Reports 1956); Poland’s objection to the Court’s jurisdiction in International Status of South West Africa (Pleadings, p. 153, in para. 2) was of a preliminary nature, as was also that raised in Interpretation of Peace Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania by the Government of Czechoslovakia, which specifically relied on Article 68 of the Statute and Article 82 of the Rules in requesting the Court to apply preliminary objection procedure (Pleadings, p. 204). (Note also the Permanent Court’s Order of 20 July 1931 on the appointment of judges ad hoc in Customs Régime between Germany and Austria, ruling by way of preliminary decision on the applicability of Article 71 of its Rules (Art. 82 in those of the present Court) and Article 31 of the Statute: P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 41, p. 89; see also the Advisory Opinion on the Consistency of Certain Danzig Legislative Decrees with the Constitution of the Free City, 1935, P.C.I.J. Series A/B, No. 65, p. 69, and the explanation of it given by my colleague Judge Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice in his dissenting opinion, Annex, para. 24.) A thorough preliminary examination would not have resulted in any delay, as the deliberation would only have required a few meetings and the interval separating the Order from the oral argument on that point, which was two days, would scarcely have been lengthened. To deal with the problem by a rejection not giving reasons, and without adequate examination, is to confuse the preliminary with the prima facie. A preliminary question is the subject of exhaustive treatment and final decision; a prima facie examination can never, by definition, be thoroughgoing, and can never lead but to a provisional decision. Articles 82 and 83 entail irrevocable decisions, as has been seen in the present proceedings.

6. The fact that the Court did not avant tout consider whether the request related to a pending legal question constitutes a refusal to apply a categorical provision of the Rules touching a problem with regard to the Court's composition. It is no reply to argue (para. 36 of the Opinion) that, in any case, the decision to refuse a judge ad hoc left the question of the Court's competence on the points of substance open; what Article 82 prohibits, in requiring an examination avant tout of the point of law, is to fix the composition of the Court otherwise than as provided by Article 83, and it is only subsequent to that point's being decided for sound reasons after a thorough legal examination that any refusal of a judge ad hoc may ensue—and not the reverse.

7. The manner in which the problem was decided therefore constitutes, in my judgment, a violation of the general system laid down in the Statute and Rules, whatever view one may hold of the idea of a legal question actually pending. Moreover, I consider that the present proceedings are in fact related to a legal question actually pending (see paras. 37-45 below), and this ought to have occasioned a deliberation as to the appointment of a judge ad hoc or, possibly, judges ad hoc in the plural.

The Advisory Opinion affirms the existence of a legal obligation on the part of States which have never ceased to affirm that that obligation did not exist. The existence or non-existence of legal obligations for States is the question put to the Court; it was even the subject of lively controversy during the discussions in the General Assembly and the Security Council, according to the documentation in the present proceedings (cf. paras. 20 et seq. below). Judging by the declarations made on behalf of States, there was a conflict of views and much hesitation as to the law applicable.

8. The Court finds in its Opinion that the question is not a dispute between States, nor even one between the Organization and a State. That is a purely formal view of the facts of the case which does not, to my mind, correspond to realities. While it is true that an advisory opinion is given to the organ entitled to request it, and not to States (Interpretation of Peace Treaties, First Phase, I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 71), the present request has been so framed as to seek an opinion on “the legal consequences for States”, a formulation which the Court in its reply has not sought to modify despite its ambiguity in relation to the rule stressed by the Court in Interpretation of Peace Treaties. The course taken by the oral proceedings before the Court, as also the text of the Court’s present Opinion, have placed South Africa in the position of respondent in a manner difficult to distinguish from contentious proceedings. (See paras. 133, 118 and 129, which are framed like judicial pronouncements in the form of decisions.)

9. The Court observed in its Judgment of 21 December 1962:

“A mere assertion is not sufficient to prove the existence of a dispute any more than a mere denial of the existence of the dispute proves its non-existence” (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 328).

One need only substitute “legal question actually pending” for “dispute” to establish that the Court had an obligation to treat the matter in depth and take it beyond the mere assertion that, while questions did lie in dispute between States, this represented, as in the case of the 1950, 1955 and 1956 Opinions, a divergence of views on points of law, as in nearly all advisory proceedings (para. 34).

10. Rather than generalizations, it is necessary to apply to the present proceedings the test adopted by the Court in 1950, when it stated that the application of the provisions of the Statute which apply in contentious cases “depends on the particular circumstances of each case and that the Court possesses a large amount of discretion in the matter” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 72).

What then are the particular circumstances of the case which might have led the Court to exercise that “large amount of discretion”? The request for an advisory opinion relates to a substantive problem over which South Africa and other States are opposed; the existence of slight divergences of view on some points among those other States is immaterial, the basic legal question for all of them without exception being that of the revocation of the Mandate with which, as a binding decision, certain States confront South Africa, but which gives rise to doubts and hesitations on the part of others; the purpose of the Advisory Opinion is to apprise the international community of the present legal position of the Territory of Namibia (South West Africa), and thus to determine the purport of a certain international status. It is another way of putting afresh the question laid before the Court in 1950: “What is the international status of the territory?” That, with the addition of “since General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI)”, could in fact have been the request.

However, any reply purporting to apprise States of the extent of their obligations subsequent to resolution 2145 (XXI) must connote not only the disposal of the conflict of views between the holder of the revoked Mandate and the States which instigated and eventually pronounced the revocation, but also the imposition on all States of a certain line of conduct.

11. It is not enough to describe the problem as a "situation" for the difficulties to cease. As the Court said in respect of disputes, "a mere assertion is not sufficient". From the viewpoint of law the description "situation" used by the Security Council has no effect so far as the Court is concerned. Without denying that the Namibia affair is and remains for the Security Council a situation, the Court, in order to determine its own competence, had to enquire whether, quite apart from what the Security Council may have thought, the request of 29 July 1970 did or did not relate to a legal question actually pending between States, within the meaning of the Rules of Court (as the Court did in its Opinion on the Interpretation of Peace Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania, First Phase, I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 72-74). Any other view would confer on the political organs of the United Nations the right to interpret, subject to no appeal, the Rules of Court.

12. The Court was faced with a legal question with pronounced political features, which is often the case, but which is not enough to overrule the argument that the issue is, at bottom, a legal one. The subject of the dispute is the conflict of views between, on the one hand, those States which, through the procedures available to the United Nations, have sought and procured the revocation of South Africa's Mandate for the Territory of South West Africa and, on the other hand, South Africa, which attacks that revocation and such effects as it might have. The way in which the request was framed adds to this basic question that of the effects for all States, that is to say even for States which have not taken any active part in the development of the action proceeded with in the United Nations; but this relates to consequences, as the request itself says, and not to the essential legal question. All this emerges strikingly from the written and oral proceedings, in which the Government of South Africa behaved like a respondent, replying to veritable claims and submissions presented by other Governments (with the exception of the French Government, whose written statement is more in the nature of an intervention by an amicus curiae).

13. There is, said the Court in 1962, a "conflict of legal views and interests—between the respondent on the one hand, and the other Members of the United Nations . . . on the other hand" (South West Africa, Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 345); and this observation was not modified in the Judgment of 1966, which dismissed the Applications not on the ground that there was no dispute, but solely in regard to the question whether the Applicants had a legal interest in the carrying-out of the "conduct" clauses of the Mandate. It is therefore impossible to deduce therefrom any refusal on the part of the Court to pronounce in any circumstances on whether there had been breaches of the Mandate (on the contrary, one might note the allusion in paras. 11 and 12 of the 1966 Judgment to Article 5 of the Mandate for South West Africa and to the right of every League member to take action to secure its observance, which connotes recognition of a legal interest in the proving of certain breaches of the Mandate). The Advisory Opinion, as is apparent from its contents, meets the concern, expressed during the discussions in the Security Council preceding its request, for proof that the Mandate was lawfully revoked; and this, by the Opinion's own admission, comprises a legal question rooted in the very origins of the Mandate, one which at all events, as we shall see below (para. 25), made its appearance before the Court as long ago as 1950.

The Court might perhaps have been encouraged to admit the existence of a genuine dispute between States if it had taken note of the fact that the General Assembly itself, in its resolution 1565 (XV) of 18 December 1960, made a pronouncement on "the dispute which has arisen between Ethiopia, Liberia and other member States, on the one hand, and the Union of South Africa on the other" (my emphasis). Need one do more than recall this fact and raise the question as to whether, in the words of the Court's Advisory Opinion of 30 March 1950 on the Interpretation of Peace Treaties, "the legal position of the parties . . . cannot be in any way compromised by the answers that the Court may give to the question put to it" (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 72)? Judge Koretsky had a similar point in mind when, in what was in many respects a comparable case, he observed that the Court, in its Advisory Opinion, would be giving "some kind of judgment as if it had before it a concrete case" (Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter), dissenting opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 254).

14. The fact that a political organ of the United Nations places a situation on its agenda cannot have the legal effect of the disappearance of a dispute between two or more States interested in the maintenance or modification of the situation. These are two different and parallel planes; one is the manifestation of the United Nations' political interest in facilitating settlement of a situation of general concern for the community of States, the other is the determination of the existence as between certain States of opposed legal interests which give them a special position in the appraisal of the situation of general concern. Naturally, the fact that there is a divergence of views on the law does not rob the Security Council or the General Assembly of the rights they derive from the Charter to consider the situation as it presents itself. But in the same way it is impossible to admit that the mere calling-in of a general situation by the political organs of the United Nations could bring about the disappearance of the element of a dispute between States if there exists such an element underlying the general situation, when such a case is in fact provided for in the Rules of Court. This is why, in each case, the question arises of whether one is or is not confronted with what is really a dispute. Articles 82 and 83 of the Rules of Court would otherwise have no meaning, whereas their purpose is to reassure States that, if an advisory opinion be requested in relation to a legal question over which they are divided, they will enjoy the right to present their views in the same way and with the same safeguards as in contentious procedure, more particularly where the composition of the Court is concerned.

15. To conclude in regard to this point, to say, as the Opinion does, that there is no dispute, and that the question of the application of Articles 82 and 83 of the Rules does not arise, is to suppose that the Court was, on the very first day of the proceedings, able to resolve the substantive question, namely the existence of a power in the United Nations, as an international organization, to revoke the Mandate. But on the day the Order of 29 January 1971 was made, before any discussion or deliberation of the substantive issues, the least that can be said is that this was still a point which remained to be proved. This is a question which was so important for all the subsequent examination of the case that the Court ought to have resolved it "avant tout", but this it failed to do. The argument that it was the Order of 29 January 1971 which established that there was no legal question pending between South Africa and other States, but merely an opinion to be given to a political organ on the consequences and repercussions of its decisions, is equivalent to an assertion that, before any oral proceedings on the substance of the case, the Court could have judicially decided the substantive problem to which the request for an advisory opinion related. To refuse the judge ad hoc applied for by South Africa before settling this basic question was to prejudice it irremediably. The questions whether a dispute existed, what it consisted of and who the parties might be were all disposed of in limine litis by the mere effect of the dismissal of the application for a judge ad hoc, for it was thereafter impossible to go back and modify that refusal, even if the examination of the substantive issues had eventually led the Court to conclude that there was in fact a legal question pending between States. The fact that the Court has confirmed the decision to refuse a judge ad hoc in its consideration of the substance does not exonerate it from the charge of having failed to consider the point of law "avant tout".

16. I would add that, even if the Court, after thorough preliminary examination of the point of law, had decided that Article 83 did not oblige it to accept the application for the appointment of a judge ad hoc, Article 68 of the Statute left it the power to do so, and on this point I would refer to the declaration of my colleagues Judges Onyeama and Dillard appended to the Order of 29 January 1971. When it is a matter of deciding whether a legal title has lawfully been withdrawn from a State and determining the legal consequences of that revocation, it is in the compelling interest of the Court that it should apply that clause of its Statute which provides for the closer approximation of advisory to contentious procedure. I am unable to accept the contention in paragraph 39 of the Opinion, to the effect that the circumstances contemplated in Article 83 of the Rules are the only ones in which the Court may agree to the appointment of a judge ad hoc in advisory proceedings (cf. the reasoning of Judge Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice in paragraph 25 of the Annex to his dissenting opinion, and that of Judge Onyeama in his separate opinion).

17. The two decisions of the Court concerning its composition affect the constantly followed rule that the Court, when it gives an advisory opinion, is exercising a judicial function (Constitution of the Maritime Safety Committee of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1960, p. 153: "The Court as a judicial body is . . . bound in the exercise of its advisory function to remain faithful to the requirements of its judicial character"; a formula reiterated in Northern Cameroons, I.C.J. Reports 1963, p. 30). For it is certain that while advisory judgments and advisory opinions are for the Court two different forms of decision, they are always the expression of its confirmed view as a tribunal on rules of international law. There are no two ways of declaring the law. For the reasons I have set down in the foregoing paragraphs, Order No. 3 of 26 January 1971 and the Order of 29 January 1971 do not appear to me to satisfy the requirements of that good administration of justice which it is the purpose of the Statute and Rules to secure.

* * *

18. Another deviation from the line of the Court's case-law is to be observed in the way in which the Court has hesitated to examine the lawfulness of the legal step which gave rise to the question upon which the Court is asked to pronounce, i.e., General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI). In paragraphs 88 and 89 of the Opinion the Court declares that the question of the validity or the conformity with the Charter of resolution 2145 (XXI), or of the Security Council resolutions, did not form the subject of the request for advisory opinion. It used not to be the Court's habit to take for granted the premises of a legal situation the consequences of which it has been asked to state; in the case concerning Certain Expenses of the United Nations it declared that:

"The rejection of the French amendment does not constitute a directive to the Court to exclude from its consideration the question whether certain expenditure were 'decided on in conformity with the Charter', if the Court found such consideration appropriate. It is not assumed that the General Assembly would seek to hamper or fetter the Court in the discharge of its judicial functions; the Court must have full liberty to consider all relevant data available to it in forming an opinion on a question posed to it for an advisory opinion." (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 157.)

The situation in the two cases is parallel; in Certain Expenses of the United Nations, as in the present case, there was some question as to the desirability of stating that the Court should examine the whole of the legal situation and in particular the validity of the acts of the General Assembly. But, unlike what has occurred in the present case, and although the General Assembly eschewed placing the Court's terms of reference on the broadest basis when it rejected the amendment of France submitted for that purpose, the Court nevertheless, on that occasion, found that it had competence and was bound to conduct that thorough examination in order to acquit itself fully of its judicative task. How indeed can a court deduce any obligation from a given situation without first having tested the lawfulness of the origins of that situation? Between the Court's decision in 1962 and the present Opinion a change of attitude is manifest.

19. In the present case, in which the Court has based its Opinion on an interpretation of Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter as to the powers of the Security Council, and on an interpretation of the legal nature of the powers of the General Assembly, it would have seemed particularly appropriate to have exercised unambiguously the Court's power to interpret the Charter, which the General Assembly itself, in resolution 171 (II) of 14 November 1947, formally recognized that it possesses. That resolution recommends the reference to the Court of points of law "relating to the interpretation of the Charter".

20. I must therefore briefly indicate the reasons why I disagree with the Court with regard to the legal nature of resolution 2145 (XXI) and its effects.

It is the content of resolution 2145 (XXI) which determines the scope of that decision; it contains various declarations:

- (a) as to the right of the peoples of South West Africa to freedom and independence, based on the Charter, General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and its previous resolutions concerning the Territory (first and seventh paragraphs of the preamble, para. 1 of resolution 2145 (XXI));
- (b) recalling the obligations under the Mandate and the supervisory powers of the United Nations as the successor to the League of Nations (second paragraph of preamble, para. 2 of the resolution);
- (c) as to the administration of the Territory in a manner regarded as contrary to the Mandate, the Charter, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (fifth paragraph of preamble, para. 3 of resolution);
- (d) as to condemnation of apartheid and racial discrimination as constituting a crime against humanity (sixth paragraph of preamble);
- (e) as to the right to take over the administration of the mandated territory (eleventh paragraph of preamble; paras. 4, 5, 6 and 7 of resolution).

21. It is also important to recall that underneath the quasi-unanimity which is often urged in favour of resolution 2145 (XXI) having certain legal effects there lie serious differences of view.

- (a) The Soviet Union and nine other States (Albania, Byelorussia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Ukraine, Yugoslavia) expressed reservations (see Secretary-General's second written statement, paras. 30 to 39) with regard to the setting-up of a United Nations organism for the administration of the Territory of Namibia, which is one of the essential objects of resolution 2145 (XXI) (cf. last paragraph of preamble and paras. 4 and 5 of the resolution).
- (b) Australia and Japan drew attention to the complexity of the legal problems involved and reminded the General Assembly that it "must keep strictly within the framework of the Charter and of international law" (ibid., Australia: para. 49; Japan: para. 57).
- (c) Canada said that "the General Assembly was not called upon to make a juridical judgment as to whether in one respect or another the government in charge of the Mandate had been delinquent in carrying out the Mandate entrusted to it . . ." (ibid., para. 50), whereas, as we have seen in paragraph 20 above, the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the preamble and paragraph 3 of the resolution make formal declarations on that subject.
- (d) The representative of Belgium explained "that his delegation's support of the text [resolution 2145 (XXI)] for which he had voted did not, in any way, imply that the delegation approved it without doubts or reservations. His delegation would have preferred the point of law of the General Assembly's competence to be clarified as fully as possible" (ibid., para. 40).
- In the same way, Brazil declared that the decision for the Mandate to be revoked and the United Nations to take over direct responsibility for the Territory "would be based on doubtful juridical grounds" and "expressed a series of reservations". For example: "it was not . . . legitimate for the General Assembly to decide to revoke the Mandate" (ibid., para. 60).
- (e) Italy and the Netherlands formally reserved their position with regard to paragraph 4, concerning an essential point of resolution 2145 (XXI): the assumption by the United Nations of direct responsibility for Namibia (ibid., paras. 45 et seq.). New Zealand reserved its position with regard to the methods of implementation.
- (f) Israel considered "that the political aspect of the question of South West Africa outweighed the possible legal problems, and that even the most scrupulous concern for legal niceties might at this juncture cede its place to the political wisdom of the majority of the General Assembly" (ibid., para. 51).
- (g) It will be recalled that two States voted against resolution 2145 (XXI) and that three abstained, while all indicating definite reservations.

22. Thus there were 24 States which, in one way or another, expressed opposition, reservations or doubt. The fact that 19 of these States voted for resolution 2145 (XXI) does not in any way diminish the effect of the observations and reservations they made upon the text, for in voting for it the States in question did not withdraw them; thus their votes signified acceptance of a political solution of which some features remained, for each of them, the subject of the opinions expressed. Resolution 2145 (XXI), therefore, was not voted with quasi-unanimity of intention; it was voted by a large majority, clearly under the strong impression that law was not being made.

It was argued before the Court on behalf of the Secretary-General that the concept of reservations was not applicable to the voting of decisions in organs of the United Nations (hearing of 8 March 1971). As the Opinion makes no pronouncement on that point, suffice it to recall that the practice is a constant one, necessitated through the need to provide States wishing to dissociate themselves from a course of action with a means of making their attitude manifest (on the usefulness and meaning of such reservations, see the opinion of Judge Koretsky in Certain Expenses of the United Nations, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 279). The consequence of the rejection of this practice and its effects would be to treat the political organs of the United Nations as organs of decision similar to those of a State or of a super-State, which, as the Court once declared in an oft-quoted phrase, is what the United Nations is not. For if a minority of States which are not in agreement with a proposed decision are to be bound, however they vote, and whatever their reservations may be, the General Assembly would be a federal parliament. As for the Security Council, to affirm the non-existence of the rights of making reservations and of abstention would, for the permanent members, be a simple encouragement to use the veto. The everyday operation of the United Nations would be deprived of all the flexibility made possible by statements of reservation and by abstention; as Judge Koretsky put it:

“Abstention from the vote on the resolutions on these or those measures proposed by the Organization should rather be considered as an expression of unwillingness to participate in these measures (and eventually in their financing as well) and as unwillingness to hamper the implementation of those measures by those who voted ‘in favour’ of them.” (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 279.)

23. Resolution 2145 (XXI) is a recommendation of the General Assembly concerning a mandated territory. With certain exceptions, recommendations have no binding force on member States of the Organization. It is therefore either in the law of mandates or in the Charter that justification for an exception must be discovered.

24. First, let us re-examine the question of revocation under the mandates system as it was originally established. The international status of the mandated territory was defined by the Court's Opinion of 1950, and "it is in accordance with sound principles of interpretation that the Court should safeguard the operation of its Opinion of 11 July 1950 not merely with regard to its individual clauses but in relation to its major purpose" (separate opinion of Judge Sir Hersch Lauterpacht annexed to Opinion of 1 June 1956, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 45). It is in this spirit that enquiry must be made whether the power of revocation of the Mandate was, either in the 1950 Opinion which is the broadest account of the principles governing the matter, or in the proceedings and arguments preceding that Opinion, regarded as being an element of the international status defined by the Court.

25. It will be recalled that the question put by point (c) of the request for opinion contained in the General Assembly resolution of 6 December 1949 ran as follows:

"Has the Union of South Africa the competence to modify the international status of the territory of South West Africa, or, in the event of a negative reply, where does competence rest to determine and modify the international status of the territory?"

This question was put in a sufficiently general way for it to have been possible, either in the Opinion of the Court, or in the separate and dissenting opinions, to raise the question of unilateral modification of the status of the Territory by the United Nations; competence "to determine and modify the status" is the widest kind of competence, since it enables the existing obligations both to be defined, and their limits stated, and also to be "modified". It is therefore important to observe that the only statement by the Court on point (c), to be found in identical terms in the reasoning and in the reply itself, was:

"that competence to determine and modify the international status of South West Africa rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations".

While it is true that the Court's conclusion replied, at the time, to a claim by the Mandatory to modify the status of the Territory unilaterally, the formula used in the Opinion is absolute, and does not contain any suggestion of exceptions, as for example the case of unilateral revocation of the Mandate, or of any partial, less substantial, modification of the status by the United Nations. It must be recognized that neither the Court nor any judge who took part in the 1950 proceedings was ready to admit the existence of a power of revocation appertaining to the United Nations in case of violation of the Mandatory's obligations.

This was not, however, because the problem was not raised before the Court at the time. The written statement of the United States Government touched on the question (I.C.J. Pleadings, International Status of South West Africa, pp. 137-139) and the Secretary-General, in his oral statement, attributed sufficient importance to it to make it one of his conclusions:

“Fourth, the possibility of revocation in the event of a serious breach of obligation by a mandatory was not completely precluded. It was suggested that in the event of an exceptional circumstance of this kind it would be for the Council or for the Permanent Court or for both to decide” (ibid., p. 234).

Then the statement went on to discuss the notion of “a solution agreed between the United Nations and the mandatory Power” (ibid., p. 236, italics in the original), which was to be confirmed by the Court in its reply to question (c). On this point, the statement ended as follows:

“Could not the International Court of Justice be put into a position to play a constructive role?” [for the interpretation and application of the Mandate] (ibid., p. 237).

Without seeking to base a decisive argument on these facts, they do nevertheless make it impossible to advance the contrary argument that the reason why the question of unilateral revocation of the Mandate was not mentioned in the Court’s reply to question (c) was because the problem had not been mentioned during the proceedings. As is apparent, it had been raised by the United States and by the Secretary-General.

26. As early as 14 December 1946, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 65 (I), inviting the Union of South Africa to propose a trusteeship agreement for the consideration of the General Assembly. And from that time on, invitations to negotiate followed each other; resolution 141 (II) of 1 November 1947, resolution of 26 November 1948, and so on up to the request for advisory opinion of 6 December 1949. After the Opinion of 11 July 1950, the General Assembly continued its efforts towards negotiation with the Union of South Africa (resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950; resolution 570 A (VI) of 19 January 1952, in which the Assembly: “Appeals solemnly to the Government of South Africa to reconsider its position, and urges it to resume negotiations . . . for the purpose of concluding an agreement providing for the full implementation of the advisory opinion”; resolution 651 (VII) of 20 December 1952, which maintained the instructions to negotiate given to the Ad Hoc Committee of Five by resolution 570 A (VI) of 19 January 1952, resolution 749 A (VIII) of 28 November 1953, etc.). Up to the time of the Eleventh Session, in 1957, the General Assembly does not seem to have conceived of any other means of solution of the problem of South West Africa than that of negotiation, and it was only in resolution 1060 (XI) of 26 February 1957 that the Committee on South West Africa was instructed to examine the legal means at the disposal of the organs of the United Nations, the Members of the United Nations, or the former

Members of the League of Nations; this was the source of the initiative of the two member States of the United Nations, who were also former Members of the League of Nations, which resulted in the Court's Judgments of 1962 and 1966. The question put to the Committee on South West Africa was:

“What legal action is open to the organs of the United Nations, or to the Members of the United Nations, or to the former Members of the League of Nations . . . to ensure that the Union of South Africa fulfils the obligation assumed by it under the Mandate . . .” (emphasis supplied).

The general line followed by the United Nations was thus to obtain a South African commitment to negotiate a trusteeship agreement, with certain attempts to arrange an interim international status, as the Opinion recalls in paragraph 84.

27. It will be sufficient to observe that between 1950 and 1960, the date of the Applications filed by Ethiopia and Liberia, when it was a question of carrying on the work done by the Court in its Opinion of 11 July 1950, no-one claimed that there existed a power of revocation of the mandate by the organs of the United Nations, or even a power to modify the provisions of the mandate by such unilateral means. The facts afford the proof: it was known in 1960 that contentious proceedings before the Court would be lengthy and would involve some risk, whereas, according to the Court's present Opinion, a power of unilateral revocation of the Mandate by the General Assembly has always existed, ever since the refusal by South Africa to submit to supervision and present reports on its administration of the Territory. The least that can be said is that the General Assembly was certainly not aware in 1960 that it had such power, when it contented itself with commending Ethiopia and Liberia upon their initiative (resolution 1565 (XV) of 18 December 1960), and that the States which opposed the claims of South Africa were no better informed since, as became apparent in October 1966, it would have been infinitely more simple and rapid to “modify” the mandate by unilateral action in 1960, even after having consulted the Court on the means to be used, by a request for advisory opinion similar to that to which the Court has now replied ex post facto. But this was never contemplated at any time before the revocation declared in October 1966, so flimsy did the idea of a unilateral power to revoke the Mandate appear.

28. In 1955, at the time of the Opinion on Voting Procedure on Questions Relating to Reports and Petitions Concerning the Territory of South West Africa (Advisory Opinion of 7 June 1955, I.C.J. Reports 1955, pp. 67 ff.), Judge Lauterpacht gave exhaustive study to all the problems raised by the implementation of the Opinion of 11 July 1950, including that of the legal position of a mandatory which systematically refused to take account of the recommendations addressed to it (cf. his separate opinion at pp. 118, 120-121 and 122). It is important to note that, even when he supposes that the Mandatory had over-stepped "the imperceptible line between impropriety and illegality, between discretion and arbitrariness, between the exercise of the legal right to disregard the recommendation and abuse of that right" (p. 120), Judge Lauterpacht does not pronounce on the possible legal sanctions, and makes no mention of the idea of revocation for violation of the obligation of the Mandatory to act in good faith. The purpose of his argument is the affirmation of the legal nature of that obligation, the idea of sanction only being relied on as a confirmation thereof.

29. The conclusion to be drawn from the conduct of the United Nations and of the States most directly concerned by solution of the problem of South West Africa is that the power of revocation is not a feature of the mandates system as it was originally established. It is not consistent with any reasonable interpretation of the powers of the General Assembly in the field of mandates to discover today that it has had for 25 years what the Council of the League of Nations had never claimed, and thus has not merely means to revoke the Mandate, but also, merely by drawing attention to such power, the possibility of obliging the Mandatory to render account to it, which is an argument that was never employed.

30. The system described in the Opinion of 11 July 1950, which did not go so far as to affirm the existence of a legal obligation to negotiate a trusteeship agreement, did not entail, even implicitly, the concept of unilateral revocation, the accent being laid exclusively on the idea of negotiation between the United Nations and the Mandatory. As the Judgment of 21 December 1962 in the South West Africa cases subsequently explained, "the Council could not impose its own view on the mandatory . . . and the mandatory could continue to turn a deaf ear to the Council's admonitions" (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 337); the 1950 Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South West Africa had said that "the degree of supervision to be exercised by the General Assembly should not therefore exceed that which applied under the mandates system . . ." (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 138).

The existence in the mandates system of a power of revocation has not been proved.

31. The second justification presented to support the revocation of the Mandate refers to a special power of the United Nations to take a decision to revoke it, even if such power did not exist with regard to mandates originally, by a sort of transposition of a general rule relating to violation of treaties. It is sought to justify resolution 2145 (XXI), with regard to its effects, by an appeal to the general theory of the violation of treaty obligations, and by affirmation of the existence of a right for the United Nations, as a party to a treaty, namely the Mandate, to put an end to that treaty by way of sanction for the refusal of the other party, the Mandatory, to fulfil its obligations.

In the first place, the idea that the mandates system is a treaty or results from a treaty is not historically correct, as was recalled by Judge Basdevant:

“The Court has felt able to rely on what it recognizes as the treaty character of the Mandate established by the decision of the Council of the League of Nations of 17 December 1920. I do not subscribe to this interpretation. I adhere to the character of the instrument made by the Council of the League of Nations on 17 December 1920 ... I have not found anything to indicate that at that time the particular character of the Council’s instrument was disputed” (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 462; emphasis supplied).

It must be added that, even if one concedes that the Mandate is a treaty, there is no rule in the law of treaties enabling one party at its discretion to put an end to a treaty in a case in which it alleges that the other party has committed a violation of the treaty. An examination of the rival contentions is necessary, and the one cannot prevail over the other until there has been a decision of a third party, a conciliator, an arbitrator or a tribunal.

32. The mandates system having been established on the international level, it became binding subject to the conditions on which it was established, that is to say without the inclusion therein of any power of revocation. To modify any international status of an objective kind, there must be applied thereto the rules which are proper to it. The argument for the unilateral power of revocation of the mandate by the General Assembly has no basis but the idea of necessity, however it may be clothed. And, as Judge Koretsky recalled in 1962, the end does not justify the means (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 268). To say that a power is necessary, that it logically results from a certain situation, is to admit the non-existence of any legal justification. Necessity knows no law, it is said; and indeed to invoke necessity is to step outside the law.

33. In these circumstances, for me the problem of the legal consequences of resolution 2145 (XXI), and of the related resolutions of the Security Council, arises in a way very different from that adopted by the Court. As Judge Lauterpacht said in 1955, and as Judge Koretsky said in 1962, I consider that the recommendations of the General Assembly, “although on proper occasions they provide a legal authorization for Members determined to act upon them individually or collectively, ... do not create a legal obligation to comply with them” (I.C.J. Reports 1955, p. 115). In the present case, in the absence of a power of revocation in the mandates system, neither the General Assembly nor even the Security Council can cause such a power to come to birth ex nihilo. Thus we have here recommendations which are eminently worthy of respect, but which do not bind member States legally to any action, collective or individual. This classic view was laid before the Court by the representative of the USSR in the case concerning Certain Expenses of the United Nations

(written statement, I.C.J. Pleadings, p. 273; oral statement, ibid., pp. 411 f.). In 1962 and in 1970, France also argued that the United Nations could not, by way of recommendation, legislate so as to bind member States (I.C.J. Pleadings, Certain Expenses of the United Nations, pp. 133 f.; written statement of France in the present case, Pleadings, Vol. I, pp. 365-368, with the reminder of frequently expressed reservations, ibid., p. 368, note; see also the declaration of the United States Government on the attitude of certain States following the Opinion on Certain Expenses of the United Nations, in particular on the problem of the double standard obtaining among member States: UN doc. A/AC.121/SR.15.Corr.1).

Resolution 2145 (XXI) is a recommendation with considerable political impact, but the member States of the United Nations, even including those which voted for its adoption, are under no legal obligation to act in conformity with its provisions, and remain free to determine their own course of action.

34. There is still to be considered the argument that the Security Council has, if need be, "confirmed" resolution 2145 (XXI) (cf. the statements made in this sense on behalf of the United States Government by Mr. Stevenson, hearing of 9 March 1971). But how can an irregular act be rendered legitimate by an organ which has declared only to have "taken note" of it or "taken it into account"? To regularize an act connotes the power of doing oneself what the first organ could not properly do. And the Security Council has no more power to revoke the Mandate than the General Assembly, if no such power of revocation was embodied in the mandates system. Hence the problem remains.

As for the contention that the Security Council was entitled under Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter to intervene directly in the revocation of the Mandate and take decisions binding on States because the situation was being dealt with under the head of the maintenance of international peace and security, that is another attempt to modify the principles of the Charter as regards the powers vested by States in the organs they instituted. To assert that a matter may have a distant repercussion on the maintenance of peace is not enough to turn the Security Council into a world government. The Court has well defined the conditions of the Charter:

"That is not the same thing as saying that [the United Nations] is a State, which it certainly is not, or that its legal personality and rights and duties are the same as those of a State. Still less is it the same thing as saying that it is a 'super-State', whatever that expression may mean." (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 179.)

35. There is not a single example of a matter laid before the Security Council in which some member State could not have claimed that the continuance of a given situation represented an immediate or remote threat to the maintenance of peace. But the Charter was drawn up with too much precaution for the disturbance of its balance to be permitted. Here again the words used before the Court in 1962 by the Soviet representative are apposite:

“The opposing of the effectiveness of the United Nations Organization to the observance of the principles of the United Nations Charter is legally groundless and dangerous. It is clear to everyone that the observance of the principles of the United Nations Charter is the necessary condition of the effectiveness of the United Nations. The experience of the United Nations clearly shows that only on the basis of the strict observance of the principles of the United Nations Charter can the Organization become an effective instrument for the maintenance of international peace and security and the development of friendly relations among States.” (I.C.J. Pleadings, Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter), pp. 411 f.; see also the French Government’s written statement in the same case, ibid., p. 134, and cf. the parliamentary statement of H.M. Government on the legal nature of obligations arising out of Security Council recommendations: Hansard, Vol. 812, No. 96, 3 March 1971, pp. 1763 ff.)

The same point was stressed by the delegates of several States in Security Council discussions of the matter with which the Court is now concerned. They pointed out that the only way of laying States under obligation would be for the Council to take a decision based on Chapter VII of the Charter after proceeding to effect the requisite determinations, a method which the Council chose not to adopt.

The degree of solidarity accepted in an international organization is fixed by its constitution. It cannot be subsequently modified through an interpretation based on purposes and principles which are always very broadly defined, such as international co-operation or the maintenance of peace. Otherwise an association of States created with a view to international co-operation would be indistinguishable from a federation. It would be precisely the “super-State” which the United Nations is not.

36. There are therefore no other consequences for States than the obligation of considering in good faith the implementation of the recommendations made by the General Assembly and the Security Council concerning the situation in Namibia (cf. oral statement on behalf of the United States, hearing of 9 March 1971, section IV in fine).

* * *

37. Nevertheless, considering the importance of the humanitarian interests at stake and of the question of principle raised before the Court for over 20 years, one cannot, I feel, merely record these legal findings and leave the matter there. It would be regrettable not to indicate means of pursuing what the Court established in 1950. It was in my view open to the Court to adopt towards the question put by the Security Council a different approach, one which would not only have been more in conformity with its traditions but also have offered the United Nations some prospects of a solution, instead of an impasse. However, as that approach was not adopted, I cannot do more than outline it.

What is essential in the case of a request for advisory opinion, as in that of a contentious application, is its actual subject, not the reasoning advanced in the course of the proceedings. A court seized of a matter must judge that matter and not another (cf. Société Commerciale de Belgique, P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 78, p. 173; Fisheries, I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 126 concerning “des éléments qui . . . pourraient fournir les motifs de l'arrêt et non en constituer l'objet”¹; similarly, in the Minquiers and Ecrehos Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1953, p. 52, the Court distinguished between the reasons advanced and the requests made). The request made to the Court was that it should define the present legal status of Namibia, and the opposing contentions of States were no more than explanations proposed to the Court, some holding that the revocation of the Mandate was final, others that it was dubious or illegal. But this is veritably a request that the Court declare what has become of the Mandate and what are the legal consequences of various actions, whether on the part of the Mandatory or on the part of the United Nations. The Court was at liberty to reply to that request with reference to other reasons than those advanced before it, and by another system of argument, on one condition, that it did not reply to another request than that formulated and that it thus avoided transforming the case “into another dispute which is different in character” (P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 78, p. 173; my emphasis).

38. The 1950 Advisory Opinion defines South West Africa as “a territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on December 17th 1920” (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 143). Thus there exists an international mandatory régime which remains in force for so long as it has not been ended by a procedure legally opposable to all States concerned. The principle of the protection of peoples not yet fully capable of governing themselves, constituting “a sacred trust of civilization” concretized in the mandate status of 1920, still holds good. The Court had in 1950 shown the legal path to follow in order to modify and, if so desired, terminate that status. It was that path which ought to have been followed.

39. The Advisory Opinion of 11 July 1950 did not, to be sure, impose upon South Africa, as a legal obligation, the conclusion of a trusteeship agreement. The Court refrained from taking to its logical extreme the position of principle which it adopted in saying "To retain the rights derived from the Mandate and to deny the obligations thereunder could not be justified" (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 133) and declined to say that the Mandatory's obligations included that of converting the Mandate into a trusteeship agreement. But that is not the end of the matter, as is shown by the suggestion of Judge De Visscher made in subsequent writings supplementing the views of his 1950 Opinion on the purport of the obligation to negotiate (I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 186 ff.) and also the treatment of the problem by Judge Lauterpacht in 1955 (para. 28 above).

¹ The English text of the Judgment does not render so clearly as the French, which is the authoritative text, the distinction between reasons (motifs) and subject-matter (objet).

40. In my view the Court should in its present Opinion have taken up and acted upon the observations made on this point by the two judges mentioned. In its Judgment of 20 February 1969 (North Sea Continental Shelf, I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 48) it recalled the import of any obligation to negotiate, already defined in the Advisory Opinion on Railway Traffic between Lithuania and Poland: it is an obligation "not to enter into negotiations but also to pursue them as far as possible with a view to concluding agreements" (P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 42, 1931, p. 116). In 1969 the Court found that the negotiations conducted prior to the North Sea Continental Shelf cases had not satisfied that condition.

41. Let us briefly recall the position hereon of the South African Government, which is to the effect that it was impossible for it to negotiate with the United Nations following the Advisory Opinion of 11 July 1950. This contention is very clearly argued in the South African Counter-Memorial and the oral statement of 11 October 1962 (I.C.J. Pleadings, South West Africa, Vol. II, pp. 86-95, and Vol. VII, pp. 241-250). According to that Government the Ad Hoc Committee set up in 1950 and the Committee on South West Africa in 1953 had been charged to seek ways and means of implementing the Advisory Opinion; similarly, the Good Offices Committee set up in 1957 was to seek an agreement whereby the Territory as a whole would continue to have an international status consistent with the purposes of the United Nations. South Africa's argument is based on these strict terms of reference and identifies them as the cause of the absence of any negotiations with a view to the implementation of the 1950 Opinion. Thus in 1959 South Africa offered "to enter into discussions with an appropriate United Nations ad hoc body that might be appointed after prior consultation with the South African Government and which would have a full opportunity to approach its task constructively, providing for fullest discussion of all possibilities", and this statement was repeated in identical terms in 1960 (ibid., Vol. I, p. 83, Mémorial of Ethiopia; and Vol. II, p. 91, Counter-Memorial).

42. Even before the 1950 Opinion the General Assembly, by successive resolutions in 1946, 1947 and 1948, had for its part thrice called upon South Africa to negotiate a trusteeship agreement. After the Court had found that South Africa was under no legal obligation to bring the Territory within the trusteeship system, the Assembly took many further initiatives to which paragraph 84 of the present Opinion alludes (see also para. 26 above).

43. The conflict of standpoints can be roughly summarized as follows: The aim of the United Nations was to arrive at the negotiation of a trusteeship agreement, whereas South Africa did not want to convert the Mandate into a trusteeship. It is necessary to determine which party has been misusing its legal position in this controversy on the extent of the obligation to negotiate. The difference in the appreciation of the legal problem as between 1950 and today bears solely on that point. In 1950 the Court was unable, in its Opinion, to envisage the hypothesis that difficulties might arise over the implementation of the obligation to observe a certain line of conduct which it found incumbent on South Africa in declaring that an agreement for the modification of the Mandate should be concluded; hence its silence on that point. But the general rules concerning the obligation to negotiate suffice. If negotiations had been begun in good faith and if, at a given juncture, it had been found impossible to reach agreement on certain precise, objectively debatable points, then it might be argued that the Opinion of 1950, finding as it had that there was no obligation to place the Territory under trusteeship prevented taking the matter further, inasmuch as the Mandatory's refusal to accept a draft trusteeship agreement could in that case reasonably be deemed justified: "No party can impose its terms on the other party" (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 139). But the facts are otherwise: negotiations for the conclusion of a trusteeship agreement never began, and for that South Africa was responsible. The rule of law infringed herein is the obligation to negotiate in good faith. To assert that the United Nations ought to have accepted the negotiation of anything other than a trusteeship agreement on bases proposed by South Africa, that, coming from the Government of South Africa, is to interpret the 1950 Advisory Opinion contrary to its meaning and to misuse the position of being the party qualified to modify the Mandate. In seeking to impose on the United Nations its own conception of the object of the negotiations for the modification and transformation of the Mandate, South Africa has failed to comply with the obligation established by the 1950 Opinion to observe a certain line of conduct.

The United Nations, on the other hand, was by no means misusing its legal position when it refused to negotiate with any other end in view than the conclusion of a trusteeship agreement, for such indeed was the goal acknowledged by the 1950 Opinion and already envisaged by the League of Nations resolution of 18 April 1946. "It obviously was the intention to safeguard the rights of States and peoples under all circumstances and in all respects, until each territory should be placed under the Trusteeship System" (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 134). It would have been legitimate for the United Nations to have taken note of the deadlock and demanded South Africa's compliance with its obligation to negotiate.

44. This view is reinforced by South Africa's consistent interpretation of its own powers, whether it be its pretention to the incorporation of the Territory—something essentially incompatible with the mandate régime—or its contentions with regard to its legal titles apart from the Mandate. The legal position of Mandatory formally recognized by the Court in 1950 gave South Africa the right to negotiate the conditions for the transformation of the Mandate into a trusteeship; since 1950 that position has been used to obstruct the very principle of such transformation.

45. An analysis on these lines, if carried out by the Court and based on a judicial finding that there had been a breach of the obligation to transform the Mandate by negotiation as the 1950 Opinion prescribed, would have had legal consequences in respect of the continued presence of South Africa in the mandated territory. I consider that, in that context, the legal consequences concerned would have been founded upon solid legal reasons.

(Signed) André GROS.

Dissenting Opinion (Judge Fitzmaurice)

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE SIR GERALD FITZMAURICE

[A summary of main conclusions is given in paragraph 10 of this Opinion; and a synoptical table of contents appears at the end, after the Annex.]

PART I

INTRODUCTORY CONSIDERATIONS

1. The real issues in the case

1. Although I respect the humanitarian sentiments and the avowed concern for the welfare of the peoples of SW. Africa which so clearly underlie the Opinion of the Court in this case, I cannot as a jurist accept the reasoning on which it is based. Moreover, the Opinion seems to me insufficiently directed to those aspects of the matter which really require to be established in order to warrant the conclusion that South Africa's mandate in respect of SW. Africa stands validly revoked. Much of the substance of the Opinion (i.e., that part of it which does not deal with formal, preliminary or incidental matters) is taken up with demonstrating that League of Nations mandates, as an international institution, survived the dissolution of the League—whereas what is really in issue in this case is not the survival of the Mandate for SW. Africa but its purported revocation. Whether or not South Africa still disputes the survival of the Mandate, it certainly disputes its survival in the form of an obligation owed to the United Nations (this is the basic issue in the case); and denies that the organs of the United Nations have any competence or power to revoke it.

2. As regards the Court's conclusion that the Mandate has been validly revoked, this can be seen to rest almost exclusively on two assumptions—or rather, in the final analysis, on one only. I speak of assumptions advisedly,—and indeed, concerning the second and more far-reaching of the two (which in one form or another really underlies and entirely motivates the whole Opinion of the Court), there is an open admission that nothing more is needed—the matter being “self-evident". These two assumptions are first that there was, or there must have been, an inherent right, vested in the United Nations, unilaterally to revoke the Mandate in the event of fundamental breaches of it (unilaterally determined to exist),—and secondly, that there have in fact been such breaches. Since it is clear that the supposed inherent right of revocation, even if it exists, could never be invoked except on a basis of fundamental breaches (several passages in the Opinion specifically recognize that only a material breach could justify revocation), it follows that the whole Opinion, or at least its central conclusion, depends on the existence of such breaches. How then does the Opinion deal with this essential matter?—essential because, if there is insufficient justification in law for the assumption, the whole Opinion must fall to the ground, as also (though not only for that reason) must the General Assembly's Resolution 2145 of 1966 purporting to revoke, or declare the termination of the Mandate, which was predicated on a similar assumption ¹.

208

3. The charges of breaches of the Mandate are of two main kinds. The first relates to the failure to carry out, in relation to the United Nations an obligation which, in the relevant provision of the Mandate itself (Article 6), is described as an obligation to make an annual report "to the Council of the League of Nations". At the critical date however, at which the legal situation has to be assessed, namely in October 1966 when the Assembly's resolution 2145 purporting to revoke the Mandate, or declare its termination, was adopted, the view that the failure to report to the Assembly of the United Nations constituted a breach of it—let alone a fundamental one—rested basically (not on a judgment ² but) on an Advisory Opinion given by this Court in 1950 which, being advisory only,

¹ Since it is important that the true character and purport of this Resolution—(not reproduced in the Opinion of the Court)—should be understood, especially as regards its tone and real motivation, I set it out verbatim and in extenso in the Annex hereto (section 3, paragraph 15). There is hardly a clause in it which is not open to challenge on grounds of law or fact;—but considerations of space forbid a detailed analysis of it on the present occasion.

² (a) So far as the reporting obligation is concerned, which is a distinct issue from that of the survival of the Mandate in se, the 1955, 1956 and 1962 pronouncements of the Court merely referred to the 1950 Opinion and added no new reasoning. In its 1962 Judgment in the preliminary (jurisdictional) phase of the then SW. Africa cases (Ethiopia and Liberia v. South Africa) in which the issue was not Article 6 but Article 7 of the Mandate, the Court, as an obiter dictum, simply recited with approval the Court's 1950 Opinion about the reporting obligation and did not further deal with the matter, which therefore still rests essentially on the 1950 Opinion. Neither in the main conclusion, nor in the operative part of the 1962 Judgment, both of which appear on p. 347 of the Court's 1962 Volume of Reports, is there any mention of or pronouncement on it. The 1955 and 1956 Opinions given in the Voting Procedure and Right of Petitions cases were equally consequential upon and based on, the original 1950 Opinion.

(b) It is not without significance perhaps, that the failure to render reports to the Assembly—so heavily relied on in the Opinion of the Court—is not specifically and rendered to the United Nations, not South Africa, was not binding on the latter and, as regards this particular matter, was highly controversial in character, attracted important dissents, and was the subject of much subsequent serious professional criticism. This could not be considered an adequate basis in law for the exercise of a power of unilateral revocation, even if such a power existed. There cannot be a fundamental breach of something that has never—in a manner binding upon the entity supposed to be subject to it—been established as being an obligation at all,—which has indeed always been, as it still is, the subject of genuine legal contestation. That South Africa denied the existence of the obligation is of course quite a different matter, and in no way a sufficient ground for predicating a breach of it.

4. The second category of charges relates to conduct, said to be detrimental to “the material and moral well-being and the social progress” of the inhabitants of the mandated territory, and thus contrary to Article 2 of the Mandate. These charges had never, at the critical date of the adoption of Assembly resolution 2145, been the subject of any judicial determination at all,—and in the present proceedings the Court has specifically refused to investigate them, having rejected the South African application to be allowed to present further³ factual evidence and connected argument on the matter. The justification for this rejection is said to be that practices of “apartheid”, or separate development, are self-evidently detrimental to the welfare of the inhabitants of the mandated territory, and that since these practices are evidenced by laws and decrees of the Mandatory which are matters of public record there is no need for any proof of them. This is an easy line to take, and clearly saves much trouble. But is it becoming to a court of law?—for the ellipsis in the reasoning is manifest. Certainly the authenticity of the laws and decrees themselves does not need to be established, and can be regarded as a matter of which, to use the common law phrase, “judicial notice” would be taken without specific proof. But the deductions to be drawn from such laws and decrees, as to the effect they would produce in the particular local circumstances, must obviously be at least open to argument,—and there are few, if any, mature systems of private law, the courts of which, whatever conclusions they might ultimately come to, would refuse to hear it. Yet it was on the very mentioned (though presumably intended to be implicitly covered) in Assembly resolution 2145, amongst the reasons for purporting to terminate the Mandate. Much more prominence is given to the attainment of independence by the mandated territory, which could not by any process of reasoning be a valid legal ground of unilateral revocation.

³ Much evidence both written and oral was of course laid before the Court in the 1965-1966 proceedings. But only four judges out of those who then composed the Court now remain,—and in any case the Court, as such, has not made any collective study of that evidence at all in the course of the present proceedings.

question of the alleged self-evidently detrimental effect of its policies of apartheid in SW. Africa, that the Mandatory wanted to adduce further factual evidence. Thus the Court, while availing itself of principles of contractual law when it is a question of seeking to establish a right of unilateral revocation for fundamental breaches, fails to apply those corresponding safeguards which private law itself institutes, directed to ensuring that there have indeed been such breaches. It is not by postulations that this can be done.

5. In consequence, since the whole Opinion of the Court turns, in the final analysis, on the view that fundamental breaches of the Mandate have occurred, it must (regrettably) be concluded that, in the circumstances above described, this finding has been reached on a basis that must endanger its authority on account of failure to conduct any adequate investigation into the ultimate foundation on which it professes to rest.

* * *

6. What, in truth, the present proceedings are or should properly speaking, and primarily, be concerned with, is not any of this, but issues of competence and powers,—for unless the necessary competence and power to revoke South Africa's mandate duly resided in the organs of the United Nations,—unless the Mandatory, upon the dissolution of the League of Nations, became accountable to such an organ,—no infringements of the Mandate, however serious, could operate in law to validate an act of revocation by the United Nations, or impart to it any legal effect. Here the fallacy, based on yet another unsubstantiated assumption underlying the whole Opinion of the Court, namely that the survival of the Mandate necessarily entailed the supervisory role of the United Nations, becomes prominent.

7. As to unilateral revocability itself, the Opinion proceeds according to a conception of the position of the various League of Nations mandatories, in relation to their mandates, which would have been considered unrecognizable in the time of the League, and unacceptable if recognized. My reading of the situation is based—in orthodox fashion—on what appears to have been the intentions of those concerned at the time. The Court's view, the outcome of a different, and to me alien philosophy, is based on what has become the intentions of new and different entities and organs fifty years later. This is not a legally valid criterion, and those thinking of having recourse to the international judicial process at the present time must pay close attention to the elaborate explanation of its attitude on this kind of matter which the Court itself gives in its Opinion.

8. Under both heads,—the competence of the United Nations to supervise, and the liability of the Mandate to (unilateral) revocation,—the findings of the Court involve formidable legal difficulties which the Opinion turns rather than meets, and sometimes hardly seems to notice at all. Inferences based on the desirability or, as the case may be, the undesirability, of certain results or consequences, do not, as my colleague Judge Gros points out, form a satisfactory foundation for legal conclusions,—no more than would such an over-simplification of the issue as that involved in the assertion that South Africa administered its mandate on behalf of the United Nations which, therefore, had the right to revoke it,—a view which quietly begs virtually every question in the case. Here again, statements to the effect that certain results cannot be accepted because this would be tantamount to admitting that given rights were in their nature imperfect and unenforceable, do not carry conviction as a matter of international law since, at the present stage of its development, this is precisely what that system itself in large measure is, and will, pending changes not at present foreseeable, continue to be. It is not by ignoring this situation that the law will be advanced.

* * *

9. Given the Court's refusal to allow the appointment of a South African judge ad hoc in the present case, in spite of its clearly very contentious character (as to this, see section 4 of the Annex hereto), it is especially necessary that the difficulties I refer to should be stated, and fully gone into. This must be my excuse for the length of an Opinion which the nature of the case makes it impossible to reduce, except at the risk of important omissions.

2. Arrangement and statement of main conclusions

10. The substance of my view is contained in the four sections A-D of Part II hereof (paragraphs 11-124). A postscriptum on certain related political aspects of the whole matter is added (paragraph 125). As regards the various preliminary issues that have arisen, these—or such of them as I have felt it necessary to consider—are, together with one or two other matters that can more conveniently be treated of there, dealt with in the Annex that follows paragraph 125. On the substantive issues in the case my principal conclusions, stated without their supporting reasoning, are as follows:

(i) Although the various mandates comprising the League of Nations mandates system survived the dissolution of that entity in 1946, neither then nor subsequently did the United Nations, which was not the League's successor in law, become invested with the supervisory function previously exercised by the Council of the League, as the corollary or counterpart of the mandatories' obligation to render reports to it. It was only if a mandated territory was placed under the United Nations trusteeship system (but there was no obligation to do this) that the supervisory relationship arose. No mandates at all (and not merely South Africa's) were ever, as such, administered on behalf of the United Nations ⁴.

(ii) The reporting obligation also survived the dissolution of the League, but became dormant until such time as arrangements for reactivating it, comparable to those which existed under the League, and acceptable to the Mandatory, could be made ⁵. It was not automatically transformed into, nor ever became, an obligation owed to the United Nations, such as to invest the latter with a supervisory function. The Mandatory's consent to what would, in effect, have been a novation of the obligation was never given.

(iii) Even if the United Nations did become invested with a supervisory function in respect of mandates not converted into trusteeships, this function, as it was originally conceived on a League basis, did not include any power of unilateral revocation. Consequently no such power could have passed to the United Nations.

(iv) Even if such a power was possessed by the Council of the League, the Assembly of the United Nations was not competent to exercise it, because of the constitutional limitations to which its action as a United Nations organ was inherently subject having regard both to the basic structure and specific language of the Charter.

(v) Except as expressly provided in certain articles of the Charter not material in the present context, the Assembly's powers are limited to discussion and making recommendations. It cannot bind the Mandatory any more than the Council of the League could do.

(vi) Having regard to conclusions (i)-(iii) above, which relate to the United Nations as a whole, the Security Council did not, on a mandates basis, have any other or greater powers than the Assembly. Its action could not therefore, on that basis, replace or validate defective Assembly

⁴ With the exception of SW. Africa, all the various mandated territories—apart of course from those that had become, or became, sovereign independent States—were placed under United Nations trusteeship. This did not by any means take place all at once,—but eventually SW. Africa was the only one to retain mandated status. However, as the Court found in its Advisory Opinion of 1950 concerning the International Status of South West Africa (I.C.J. Reports 1950, at p. 144), the mandatories were not under any legal obligation to place mandated territories under the trusteeship system.

⁵ It appears that none of the mandatories rendered reports to the United Nations in the interval (which could be as much as about two years) before the mandated territory was converted into a trust territory or, in some cases, became independent.

action. The Security Council equally had no power to revoke the Mandate.

(vii) The Security Council cannot, in the guise of peace-keeping, validly bring about a result the true character of which consists of the exercise of a purported supervisory function relative to mandates.

(viii) Even where the Security Council is acting genuinely for the preservation or restoration of peace and security, it has no competence as part of that process to effect definitive and permanent changes in territorial rights, whether of sovereignty or administration,—and a mandate involves, necessarily, a territorial right of administration, without which it could not be operated.

(ix) The “Legal consequences for States” of the foregoing conclusions are that the Mandate was not validly revoked by United Nations action in 1966 or thereafter, and still subsists;—that the Mandatory is still subject to all the obligations of the Mandate, whatever these may be and has no right to annex the mandated territory or otherwise unilaterally alter its status;—but that nor has the United Nations,—and that its member States are bound to recognize and respect this position unless and until it is changed by lawful means.

* * *

In Part II of this opinion, which comes next, the reasoning in support of these conclusions is distributed in the following way: as to conclusions (i) and (ii), in Section A, paragraphs 11-64; as to conclusion (iii), in Section B, paragraphs 65-89; as to conclusions (iv)-(viii), in Section C, paragraphs 90-116; and as to conclusion (ix), in Section D, paragraphs 117-124. The postscriptum (paragraph 125) follows. The Annex is separately paragraphed and footnoted.

PART II

SUBSTANCE

SECTION A

THE UNITED NATIONS NEVER BECAME INVESTED WITH ANY SUPERVISORY FUNCTION IN RESPECT OF MANDATES AS SUCH*1. Absence of any legal successorship as between the United Nations and the League of Nations*

11. There being no general rule of international law which would involve a process of automatic successorship on the part of such an entity as the United Nations to the functions and activities of a former entity such as the League of Nations, there are only three ways in which the United Nations could, upon the dissolution of the League, have become invested with the latter's powers in respect of mandates as such: namely, (a) if specific arrangement to that effect had been made,—(b) if such a succession must be implied in some way,—or (c) if the mandatory concerned—in this case South Africa—could be shown to have consented to what would in effect have been a novation of the reporting obligation, in the sense of agreeing to accept the supervision of, and to be accountable to, a new and different entity, the United Nations, or some particular organ of it.

12. It is my view that the United Nations did not in any of these three ways become clothed with the mantle of the League in respect of mandates;—but as regards the first of them, it is necessary to make it clear at the outset that the matter went far beyond the field of mandates. There was in fact a deliberate, general, politically and psychologically motivated, rejection of any legal or political continuity at all between the United Nations and the League (see paragraphs 35 and 36 below). Since mandates were regarded as one of the League's political activities, this raises a presumption that there was not any takeover by the United Nations of the League mandates system as such,—a view fully borne out by the creation of the parallel United Nations trusteeship system, and the fact that the mandatories were invited to convert their mandates into trusteeships, though without obligation to do so. These matters will however more conveniently be considered later, in their historical context;—and the same applies to the question of whether South Africa, as Mandatory, ever consented to the transfer to the United Nations of obligations which, at the date of the entry into force of the Charter, were owed to the League which was then still in existence, and remained so for some time after.

13. Meanwhile I turn to the second of the three possibilities mentioned in the preceding paragraph,—namely that there was an implied succession by the United Nations to League functions in respect of mandates, and correspondingly an implied transfer to the United Nations of the obligations owed by the Mandatory to the League. It is easy to assume that because the United Nations had certain resemblances to the League and might have been regarded as its “natural” successor, therefore it was the legal successor;—but this was not the case. It is no less easy to assume, as the Opinion of the Court clearly does—virtually without arguing the point—that if, and because, the various mandates survived the dissolution of the League, therefore the United Nations must necessarily and ipso facto have become entitled to exercise a supervisory role in respect of them, although they were a League, not a United Nations institution, and are mentioned in the Charter only as territories that can, but do not have to be, placed under United Nations trusteeship. The fallacy in this kind of reasoning—or rather, presupposition, is evident. Even the argument that only the United Nations could play such a part is, as will be seen, erroneous.

2. No automatic or implied succession

(i) Origin and nature of the supervisory function

14. The Council of the League of Nations (of which three of the principal mandatories were permanent members) was never itself in terms invested eo nomine with what has become known as the supervisory function relative to the conduct of the various mandates⁶. The very term “supervisory” is moreover misleading in the light of the League voting rule of unanimity including the vote of the member State affected,—that is to say, when mandates were in question, the mandatory. The so-called supervisory function was in reality predicated upon and derived from the obligation of the mandatories^{6a} to furnish an annual report to the Council, through the then Permanent Mandate Commission,—as a sort of inference, corollary or counterpart of that obligation. It was in that way and no other that what has been called the accountability of the mandatories arose. This point, which is of primary importance when it comes to determining what was the real nature of the supervisory function as exercisable by the League Council, and whether it included the power to revoke a mandatory's ^{6b} mandate, is developed in full in Section B below. Its relevance here is that it was this reporting obligation, and such "accountability" as an obligation of that order may imply ⁷, that gave rise to the specific function of supervision, not vice versa;—and what is incontestably clear is that the whole question of who, or what entity, was entitled to supervise, was bound up with and depended on the prior question of who, or what entity, mandatories were obliged to report to and, to that extent, become accountable to (but accountability did not in any event—see footnote 7—imply control).

⁶, ^{6a}, ^{6b} The plural, or the indefinite article, and small letter “m” is used in the present opinion whenever the context does not require the sense to be confined to the Mandate for SW. Africa or South Africa as Mandatory. Failure to do this must result in a distortion of perspective;—for, subject to the differences between “A”, “B” and “C” mandates, as adumbrated in paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of Article 22 of the League Covenant, and as resulting from the texts of the various categories of mandates, the position in most of the connections with which this case is concerned was the same for all the mandates and mandatories—not peculiar to SW. Africa. In particular, none of the mandates conferred any specific supervisory function on the League Council, and none went further in this respect than to include the reporting obligation in substantially the same terms.

(ii) Distinction between the reporting obligation in se and the question of what entity can claim performance of it

15. It follows that in order to determine what entity, if any, became invested with the supervisory function after the disappearance of the League and its Council, it is necessary to ascertain what entity, if any, the mandatories then became obliged to report to, if they continued to be subject as mandatories to the reporting obligation at all—(see footnote 5, paragraph 10 above). More specifically, in the context of the present case, in order to answer the question whether the United Nations, in particular, became invested with any supervisory function, it will be necessary to determine whether, in respect of any mandated territory not placed under the United Nations trusteeship system, the mandatory concerned became obliged to report to some organ of the United Nations (and notably to its General Assembly, found by the Court in its 1950 Opinion to be the most appropriate such organ for the purpose). The underlying issue is whether the United Nations could claim not merely a right to be reported to, but an exclusive right, in the sense that the obligation arose in relation to it and it alone, and no other entity. In different terms: first, given, as is generally accepted⁸, that the various mandates survived the dissolution of the League, then did the reporting obligation, the situation of accountability considered in the abstract so to speak, equally survive that dissolution as part of the concept of mandates;—and secondly, if so, did it survive in the form of, or become converted into, an obligation to report, to be accountable not just to some organ, but to that particular organ which was and is the Assembly of the United Nations?

⁷ As will be seen later, reporting in the context of mandates had none of the implications that are involved when, for instance, it is said that "X" reports to "Y" (a superior), which implies that "X" takes his orders from "Y". This was not the position as between the League Council and the mandatories, any more than it is as between the competent organs of the United Nations and member States administering trust territories (see below, paragraphs 77 and 104, and also footnote 66, paragraphs (b) and (c)).

(iii) The reporting obligation, if it survived, was capable of implementation otherwise than by reporting to a United Nations organ

16. It is of course evident that if a reporting obligation survived the dissolution of the League, the furnishing of reports to an organ of the United Nations, in particular the General Assembly, was not the only possible way in which that obligation could be discharged; nor was a United Nations organ, specifically as such, in any way indispensable as a recipient, and commentator on or critic of such reports. There were at the time, and there are now, several international bodies in existence, much more comparable in character to the League Council, or at least to the former Permanent Mandates Commission, than the United Nations Assembly, to which any mandatory preferring that course could have arranged to report, and with which it could have carried on the sort of dialogue that was carried on with the League organs;—*and here it is of primary importance to bear in mind that the absence of any compulsory powers vested in such a body would have had no bearing on the situation, since neither the League Council nor the Assembly of the United Nations had any such powers in this matter*⁹. Alternatively, if no appropriate body could be found willing to act, it would have been open to any mandatory, perhaps acting in conjunction with others, to set one up,

⁸ So far as this aspect of the subject is concerned, the South African contention that the Mandate is at an end is both conditioned and indirect. It is maintained on the one hand that the reporting obligation lapsed in its entirety on the dissolution of the League because it then became impossible to perform it according to its actual terms,—but also that it was not an essential part of the Mandate which could continue without it. At the same time it is maintained that if the obligation is non-severable—if it is an essential part of the Mandate—then its lapse entails the lapse of the Mandate as a whole. These are alternative positions and there is no contradiction between them as the Opinion of the Court seeks to claim.

⁹ This point, which goes to the root of much of the case, is more fully developed in Section B below. According to League procedure the Council's decisions were not binding on the mandatory concerned unless the latter concurred in them, at least tacitly; while the resolutions of the United Nations Assembly—except in certain specific cases not material in this context—only have the status of recommendations and have no binding effect except, at most (and even that is open to argument) for those who have affirmatively voted in favour of them.

to which the necessary reporting undertakings would be given,—the ensuing reports, and comments thereon, being made public ¹⁰.

- (iv) There was no survival of the reporting obligation in the form of an automatic obligation to report to a United Nations organ—Basic differences between the League Council and the United Nations Assembly as a supervisory body

17. For present purposes it is unnecessary to express any final view as to whether the reporting obligation did or did not, in the abstract, or as a concept, survive the dissolution of the League, because in any event I do not consider that it survived in the form of an automatic self-operating obligation to report to and accept the supervision, specifically, of the United Nations, and in particular of its General Assembly. The unconscious assumption (or has it been deliberate?) which has dogged the SW. Africa question for so many years, that it was all the same thing for a mandatory whether it reported to the League Council or to the United Nations Assembly, so why should it not do so, is of course quite illusory, because the character of the supervisory organ affects the character and weight of the obligation. Taking this view does not necessarily mean accepting the South African contention that the reporting obligation was so intimately bound up with the character of the entity to be reported to that, upon the extinction of that entity, it must lapse entirely ¹¹. But I do accept the view that in no circumstances could an obligation to report to and accept supervision at the hands of one organ—the League Council—become converted automatically and ipso facto, and without the consent of the mandatory (indeed against its will), into an obligation relative to another organ, very differently composed, huge in numbers compared with the League Council, functioning differently, by different methods and procedures, on the basis of a different voting rule, and

¹⁰ In fact, none of the mandatories did this,—nor did any of them report to the United Nations,—but, apart from South Africa, they did eventually convert their mandates into trusteeships.

¹¹ See further as to this in Section D below, paragraphs 119-120. The matter turns on:

- (i) whether, as the Court found in 1950 (I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 136-137), the reporting obligation, in so far as it implied supervision, was so important a part of a mandate that if the latter survived, the former must too,—or whether, as Judge Read thought (ibid., p. 165), the absence of reporting, etc., might “weaken the mandate” but not otherwise affect it;
- (ii) the effect, if the situation is a contractual or quasi-contractual one, of the extinction of one of the parties,—in this case of the League of Nations; and
- (iii) if the situation is not of that kind, the legal status of a provision that can no longer be carried out according to its actual terms but can perhaps be implemented in some equivalent way.

against the background of a totally different climate of opinion, philosophy and aim, unsympathetic by nature to the mandatory¹². Indeed the very fact that the supervision of a mandate would have become exercisable by an organ which disapproved in principle of mandates that remained mandates, and held it from the start almost as an article of faith (this will be reverted to later, for it is a cardinal point) that all mandated territories should be placed under its own trusteeship system,—and whose primary aim moreover, in all its dealings whether with trust territories, mandated territories, or non-self-governing territories under Article 73 of the Charter, was to call into existence as speedily as possible a series of new

¹² The following table makes this clear:

I. International Organization:—	League of Nations.	United Nations.
II. Report receiving or supervisory body:—	League Council.	General Assembly.
III. Numbers of same:—	Small (varied through 9-11-13) and included the then permanent members of which three were mandatories.	Potentially unlimited. 50/60 even in 1946—now 130-140 and still growing.
IV. Voting rule:—	Unanimity, including vote of Mandatory.	Two-thirds majority; sometimes possibly a bare majority.
V. Advisory sub-organ:—	Permanent Mandates Commission.	Trusteeship Council; Committee of the Assembly; or “subsidiary organ” set up under Art. 22 of the Charter.
VI. Composition of sub-organ:—	Experts acting in their personal capacity, not as representatives of governments.	Representatives of governments.
VII. Attitude and approach of supervisory body:—	Sympathetic to the mandatories—not over-political.	Unsympathetic to mandatories,—highly political.
VIII. Aim:—	Good administration of the mandated territory.	Earliest possible bringing about of the independence of the territory.

sovereign independent States;—all this alone would have been sufficient to create, and perpetuate, a permanent state of tension between the United Nations Assembly as a supervisory organ and any mandatory held accountable to it. None of this existed under the régime of the League.

18. Exactly the same considerations apply to any Committee or sub-Committee of the Assembly which might be set up to deal with mandates, and which, however it might be dressed up to look like the former League Council or Permanent Mandates Commission (see the proposal made in Assembly resolution 449 (V) of 13 December 1950) would remain fully under the Assembly's control, and reflect its tendencies and aims. Indeed this has been only too self-evidently the case as regards those Committees that have been (at later stages) set up with reference to the SW. Africa question.

(v) Conclusion as to implied succession

19. For these reasons it seems to me to be juridically impossible to postulate such a metamorphosis as taking place automatically or unless by consent. To do so would not merely be to change the identity of the organ entitled to supervise the implementation of the obligation but, by reason of this change, to change also the nature of the obligation itself. Given the different character and methods of that organ, it would be to create a new and more onerous obligation (it is of course, inter alia, precisely because of the possibility of this, that novations require consent). I must therefore hold that no such transformation ever took place of itself so that, if consent was lacking, the United Nations never became invested with any supervisory function at all. This view will now be developed, first by way of answer to various counter-arguments that have been or may be advanced,—secondly on the basis of certain positive and concrete considerations which have never been given their true weight, but are to my mind decisive.

3. Counter-contentions as to implied succession

(a) The Advisory Opinion of the Court of 11 July 1950

20. In the 1950 advisory proceedings there was a striking, though quite differently orientated parallelism between the South African arguments on this matter and the views expressed by the Court, due to a mutual but divergently directed confusion or telescoping of the two separate questions already noticed, of the survival of the reporting obligation as such, and the form of its survival, if survival there was. Contending that this obligation had never been contemplated except as an obligation relative to the Council of the League, and could not therefore, upon the dissolution of the latter and the establishment of the United Nations, become automatically transformed into an obligation owed to that Organization, South Africa argued that because this was so, therefore all obligations of accountability had disappeared. This deduction may have been natural, but clearly lacked logical rigour and necessity,—for the obligation as such could survive, even though becoming dormant for the time being.

21. The same process of ellipsis, though with quite another outcome, characterized the reasoning of the Court in 1950. Holding that the reporting obligation was an essential part of the mandates system, and must survive if the system itself survived, the Court went on to hold that therefore it survived as an obligation to report specifically to the Assembly of the United Nations. This last leg of the argument not only lacked all logical rigour and necessity but involved an obvious fallacy,—which was the reason for the dissenting views expressed by Judges Sir Arnold McNair (as he then was) and Read—dissenting views with which I agree. It obviously could not follow, as the Court in effect found, that because the United Nations happened to be there, so to speak, and, in the shape of the trusteeship system, had set up something rather similar to the mandates system, therefore not merely trusteeships but mandates also were subject to United Nations supervision. This again was a *non sequitur*¹³. It was tantamount to saying that although (as the Court found later in the same Opinion—I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 138-140) mandatories were not obliged to place their mandated territories under trusteeship, yet for all practical purposes they had to accept United Nations supervision just the same whether or not they had placed the territories under trusteeship. This does not make sense. The result was that in effect the Court cancelled out its own finding that trusteeship was not obligatory—and made it a case of “Heads I win: tails you lose”! It is not too much to say that the absence of any legal obligation to place mandated territories under trusteeship implied a fortiori, as a necessary deduction, the absence of any legal obligation to accept United Nations supervision in respect of mandates, or the one would be defeated by the other.

¹³ The following passage from the Court’s Opinion (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 136) exhibits very graphically the telescoping of the (valid) premiss that accountability in principle had not necessarily disappeared with the League, with the (invalid) deduction that mandatories were thereby necessarily obliged to hold themselves accountable to the United Nations:

“It cannot be admitted that the obligation to submit to supervision had disappeared merely because the supervisory organ has ceased to exist, when the United Nations has another [precisely!] international organ performing similar, though not identical supervisory functions”—(my italics).

The non sequitur is clearly apparent. The Court did not seem to see that the transition to a new and different party could not occur of itself or simply be presumed to have taken place;—and the present Opinion of the Court compounds the fallacy.

22. Clearly the existence of the United Nations, and its superficial resemblances to the League, had absolutely nothing to do in logic with the survival of the reporting obligation, except in so far as it provided a convenient (but not obligatory) method of discharging that obligation if it did survive. This was Judge Read's view in 1950. Having found that there had been no consent on the part of the Mandatory to the exercise of United Nations supervision, in the absence of which the only possible basis for such an obligation would be "succession by the United Nations", he continued (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 172):

"Such a succession could not be based upon the provisions of the Charter, because . . . no provisions of the Charter could legally affect an institution founded upon the Covenant or impair or extinguish [the] Legal rights and interests of those Members of the League which are not members of the United Nations¹⁴. It could not be based on implications or inferences drawn from the nature of the League and the United Nations or from any similarity in the functions of the organizations. Such a succession could not be implied, either in fact or in law, in the absence of consent, express or implied by the League, the United Nations and the Mandatory Power. There was no such consent"—(my italics).

(b) Did the Charter imply accountability obligations for mandatories?

(i) In general

23. The Charter makes no specific mention of mandated territories at all, except in the two Articles (77, and 80, paragraph 2) where it refers to them, along with other types of territories, as candidates for being placed under trusteeship but without creating any obligation in that regard. It says nothing at all either about supervision or accountability. The contention that the Charter is to be read as if in fact it did so, is therefore founded entirely on a process of implication,—a process sought to be founded on two particular provisions, Articles 10, and 80, paragraph 1. These must now be considered.

¹⁴ It was and is conveniently forgotten—though not by Judge Read—that at the time when the Charter came into force (October 1945), and until April 1946, the League was still in being.

(ii) Article 10 of the Charter

24. For Article 10 to suffice in itself, it would be necessary to find in it not only a competence conferred on the Assembly to exercise a supervisory role in respect of mandates, but also an obligation for mandatories to accept that supervision and be accountable to the Assembly. Since the Article makes no mention of mandates as such, the argument would have to be that the faculty given to the Assembly by that provision “to discuss [and ‘make recommendations . . . as to’] any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter”, not only invested the Assembly with a supervisory function in respect of mandates, but also obliged mandatories to accept the Assembly in that role and regard themselves as accountable to it. Quite apart from the fact that a faculty merely to “discuss . . . and . . . make [non-binding] recommendations” could not possibly extend to or include so drastic a power as a right unilaterally to revoke a mandate, it is evident that a faculty conferred on “A” cannot, in and of itself—even in relation to the same subject-matter—automatically and ipso facto create an obligation for “B”¹⁵. The non sequitur—the absence of any nexus is apparent, and the gap cannot be bridged in the way the Court seeks to do (see footnote 16 below). Furthermore, since one of the basic questions at issue is, precisely, whether mandates as such—as opposed to trusteeships and mandated territories placed under trusteeship—are “within the scope of the Charter”, the whole argument founded on Article 10 of the Charter is essentially circular and question-begging.

25. Article 10 was, and is, a provision which, without in terms mentioning mandates, or indeed anything specific at all, ranges over the vast field implied by the words “any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter". This could cover almost anything¹⁷. Yet could it reasonably be contended that in relation to anything the Assembly might choose to discuss under this provision, and which could fairly be regarded as included in it, authorities and bodies in all member States of the United Nations thereby, and without anything more, would become obliged at the request of the Assembly to submit reports to it, and accept its supervision concerning their activities? The question has only to be put, for its absurdity to be manifest. Nothing short of express words in Article 10 could produce such an effect. Upon what juridical basis therefore, can an obligation to report and accept supervision in respect of mandates be predicated upon this provision? It was precisely this absence of logical necessity, or even connexion, that motivated Lord McNair's dissent in 1950. After saying that he could not find any legal ground upon which the former League Council could be regarded as being replaced by the United Nations for the purpose of being reported to and exercising supervision, which "would amount to imposing a new obligation¹⁸ upon the [mandatory] and would be a piece of judicial legislation", he continued (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 162):

¹⁵ For instance the setting up of an authority empowered to conduct and collect information in view of a census, does not of itself oblige the population to co-operate. Census laws, in addition to the obligation imposed on the census authority, impose a separate obligation on all members of the population to co-operate, with penalties for any default. Otherwise the latter obligation would not exist,—and the former would in consequence be vain.

¹⁶ As in 1950, the Court, while finding in Article 10 the competence of the Assembly to supervise, professes to find the obligation of the mandatory to be accountable to the Assembly (a) in Article 80 of the Charter, (b) in an alleged recognition of accountability to the United Nations, supposed to have been given by all the mandatories when they voted in favour of the final League of Nations resolution on mandates of 18 April 1946. As will be seen (paragraphs 26-32 and 54-55 below) such an obligation cannot be derived from either source.

"In saying this, I do not overlook the competence of the . . . Assembly . . . under Article 10 of the Charter, to discuss the Mandate . . . and to make recommendations concerning it, but that competence depends not on any theory of implied succession but upon the provisions of the Charter."

In other words, even if the provisions of the Charter might be sufficient to found the competence of the Assembly—even so, only to discuss and recommend—they must also be shown to establish the obligation of the mandatory, since no theory of implied succession could be prayed in aid¹⁹;—and in so far as it is sought to rely on the terms of Article 10 for

¹⁷ It suffices to look at the Preamble to the Charter, and Article 1 and the provisions of Chapters IX and X, in order to see how great the range is, even omitting things like peace-keeping and sundry miscellanea.

¹⁸ "New" because, since the League clearly had not assigned its supervisory rights to the United Nations (see further as to this, paragraph 42 below), only a novation could have produced the effect that the Court found in favour of in 1950. But a novation would have required the mandatory's consent, which Lord McNair did not think had been given. Speaking of the various contemporary statements made on behalf of South Africa, he said (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 161) that he did not find in them "adequate evidence" that the mandatory had "either assented to an implied succession by the United Nations . . . , or . . . entered into a new obligation towards [it] to revive the pre-war system of supervision".

¹⁹ Lord McNair had already held (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 159) that it was a "pure inference" [i.e., in the context a mere supposition] "that there [had] been an automatic succession by the United Nations to the rights and functions of the this purpose, it is clear that they will not bear the weight that would thereby be put upon them.

(iii) Article 80 of the Charter

26. This is another provision (its terms are set out below²⁰) to which it has been sought to give an exaggerated and misplaced effect, and which equally cannot bear the weight thus put upon it. (It is true that the second paragraph manifests an expectation that mandated territories would be placed under the trusteeship system,—but expressions of expectation do not create obligations, as the Court found in 1950, specifically in relation to this provision—I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 140.) As for the first paragraph, the changes which it rules out are clearly those, and only those, that might result from Chapter XII (the trusteeship chapter) of the Charter (“nothing in this Chapter [i.e., XII] shall be construed . . . to alter . . . etc.”)—and, as Lord McNair pertinently observed in 1950, “the cause of the lapse of the supervision of the League and of Article 6 of the Mandate²¹ is not anything contained in Chapter XII of the Charter, but is the dissolution of the League, so that it is difficult to see the relevance of this Article”. It is of course possible to hold on other grounds that the principle of accountability, as expressed in the form of the reporting obligation, though becoming dormant, did not lapse with the dissolution of the League (paragraphs 17 and 20 above). What cannot legitimately be held is that if it did so lapse—or would otherwise have done so—it was preserved or revived by reason of Article 80,—for that provision’s sole field of preservation was from extinction due to the effects of Chapter XII, not from extinction resulting from the operation of causes lying wholly outside that Chapter.

Council of the League in this respect; . . . as the Charter contained no provision for [such] a succession . . . [which] could have been expressly preserved and vested in the United Nations . . . but this was not done”.

²⁰ Article 80 of the Charter reads as follows:

“1. Except as may be agreed upon in individual trusteeship agreements, made under Articles 77, 79 and 81, placing each territory under the trusteeship system, and until such agreements have been concluded, nothing in this Chapter shall be construed in or of itself to alter in any manner the rights whatsoever of any States or any peoples or the terms of existing international instruments to which Members of the United Nations may respectively be parties—(my italics).

2. Paragraph 1 of this Article shall not be interpreted as giving grounds for delay or postponement of the negotiation and conclusion of agreements for placing mandated and other territories under the trusteeship system as provided for in Article 77.”

²¹ Article 6 of the Mandate for SW. Africa embodies the reporting obligation.

27. Still less can it be legitimate to hold that the reporting obligation was not only preserved as a concept, but became, by some sort of silent alchemy, actually converted by Article 80 into an obligation to report to an (unspecified) organ of the United Nations. The impossibility of attributing this last effect to Article 80 becomes manifest if it be recalled that at the date (24 October 1945) when the Charter, including Article 80, came into force, the League of Nations was still in existence (and continued so to be until 18 April 1946)²², so that the reporting obligation was still owed to the Council of the League. If therefore Article 80 could have operated at all to save this obligation from causes of lapse lying outside Chapter XII of the Charter, it is in that form that it must have preserved it—i.e., as an obligation in relation to the League Council;—and there is no known principle of legal construction that could, simply on the basis of a provision such as Article 80, cause an obligation preserved in that form, to become automatically and ipso facto converted six months later into an obligation relative to a different entity of which no mention had been made. If, to cite Article 80, Chapter XII was not to be “construed” as altering, “the terms of existing international instruments”, then what was not to be altered were those provisions of the mandates and of Article 22 of the League Covenant (then still in force) for reporting to the League Council (then still in being). How then is it possible to read Article 80, not as preserving that obligation but (as if at the wave of the magician’s wand) creating a new and different obligation to report to a new and very different kind of organ—the United Nations Assembly?—a change which could not have been a matter of indifference to the mandatories.

28. It comes to this therefore, that there is absolutely nothing in Article 80 to enable it to be read as if it said “The League is still in being, but if and when it becomes extinct, all mandatories who are Members of the United Nations will thereupon owe to the latter Organization their obligations in respect of mandated territories”. That of course (see per Lord McNair in footnote 19 above) is precisely what (or something like it) the Charter ought to have stated, in order to bring about the results which—(once it had become clear that SW. Africa was not going to be placed under the United Nations trusteeship system)—it was then attempted to deduce from such provisions as Articles 10 and 80. But the Charter said no such thing, and these Articles, neither singly nor together, will bear the weight of such a deduction.

29. The truth about Article 80 can in fact be stated in one sentence: either the mandates, with their reporting obligations, would in any event have survived the dissolution of the League on a basis of general legal principle or, as some contend, of treaty law, and there would have been no need of Article 80 for that particular purpose²³;—or else, if survival had to depend on the insertion of an express provision in the Charter, Article 80 was not effectual for the purpose—guarding as it did only against possible causes of lapse arising out of Chapter XII itself, which was not the cause of the dissolution of the League. In consequence, quite a different type of provision would have been required in order to produce the results now claimed for Article 80.

²² Although it was known de facto that the League would be dissolved, there was nothing in the Charter to compel those Members of the United Nations who were also Members of the League to take this step, still less to take it by any particular date.

30. It is argued that the foregoing interpretation deprives Article 80 of all meaning, since (so it is contended) there is nothing in Chapter XII of the Charter that could alter or impair existing rights, etc. Even if this were the case, it would not be a valid juridical reason for reading into this provision what on any view is not there, namely a self-operating United Nations successorship to League functions,—the automatic conversion of an obligation of accountability to the League Council (still extant when Article 80 came into force) into an obligation towards the Assembly of the United Nations. But in any event this argument is not correct. Article 80 remains fully meaningful,—and its intended meaning and effect, so far as mandates were concerned, was to guard against the possibility that the setting-up of the trusteeship system might be regarded as an excuse for not continuing to observe mandates obligations, whatever these were, and continued to be. But it did not define what these were, or say whether they continued to be. Furthermore it was only “in and of itself” (words all too frequently overlooked) that the creation of the trusteeship system was not to affect mandates. But if these lapsed from some other (valid) cause, Article 80 did not, and was never intended to operate to prevent it. In short, Article 80 did not cause them to survive,—but if they did (otherwise) survive, then the setting-up of the trusteeship system could not be invoked as rendering them obsolete.

²³ This was the view taken by Ambassador Joseph Nisot, the former Belgian delegate and juriconsult whose knowledge of the United Nations dates from the San Francisco Conference. Writing in the South African Law Journal, Vol. 68, Part III (August 1951), pp. 278-279, he said:

“The only purpose of the Article is to prevent Chapter XII of the Charter from being construed as in any manner affecting or altering the rights whatsoever of States and peoples, as they stand pending the conclusion of trusteeship agreements. Such rights draw their judicial life from the instruments which created them; they remain valid in so far as the latter are themselves still valid. If they are maintained, it is by virtue of those instruments, not by virtue of Article 80, which confines itself to providing that the rights of States and peoples—whatever they may be and to whatever extent may subsist—are left untouched by Chapter XII.”

For a similar view by a former judge of the Permanent Court (also a delegate at

31. The argument founded upon the reference to Article 80 contained in Article 76 (d) of the Charter is equally misplaced and turns in the same circle. Without doubt the effect of this reference was that in so far as any preferential economic or other rights were preserved by reason of Article 80, they formed exceptions to the régime of equal treatment provided for by Article 76 (d). But this left it completely open what preferential rights were thus preserved. They were of course only those preserved from extinction because of the operation of Chapter XII of the Charter, not those that might be extinguished from other causes. The point is exactly the same as before.

32. If neither Article 10 nor 80, taken singly, created an obligation to report to the United Nations Assembly, it is evident that, taken together, they cannot do so either. If anything, the reverse is the effect,—two blanks only create a bigger blank.

(c) The Organized World (or "International") Community Argument

33. This argument, not previously prominent, the essence of which is to postulate an inherent continuity between the League of Nations and the United Nations, as being only different expressions of the same overriding idea, emerged in the course of the South West Africa cases (Ethiopia and Liberia v. South Africa, 1960-1966). It is obviously directed to supplying a possibly plausible foundation for something that has no basis in concrete international law. It has no such basis because the so-called organized world community is not a separate juridical entity with a personality over and above, and distinct from, the particular international organizations in which the idea of it may from time to time find actual expression. In the days of the League there was not (a) the organized world community, (b) the League. There was simply the League, apart from which no organized world community would have existed. The notion therefore of such a community as a sort of permanent separate residual source or repository of powers and functions, which are re-absorbed on the extinction of one international organization, and then automatically and without special arrangement, given out to, or taken over by a new one, is quite illusory²⁴.

San Francisco) see Manley Hudson in American Journal of International Law, Vol. 45 (1951), at p. 14.

²⁴ Nor does international law know anything comparable to such principles of private law as those for instance which, in the event of a failure of all heirs to given property, cause it to pass as bona vacantia to the State, the fisc, the Crown, etc.; so that although there is no "inheritance" as such, there is a successorship in law. Moreover, what is in question in the present case is not property but the exercise

34. It is evident therefore that, in the instant case, this theory is put forward with a view to circumventing, ex post facto, what would otherwise be—what is—an insuperable juridical obstacle,—namely the lack of any true successorship in law between the League of Nations and the United Nations. In the absence of such successorship, the “organized world [or ‘international’] community” argument can be seen for what it is—an expedient;—for it is quite certain that none of the States that, as mandatories, assumed obligations to report to the League Council could for one moment have supposed that they were thereby assuming an open-ended obligation to report for all time to whatever organ should be deemed, at any given moment, to represent a notional and hypothetical organized world community, and regardless of how such a community might be constituted or might function.

4. Political rejection in the United Nations of any continuity with the League of Nations

(a) In general and in principle

(i) Attitude towards the League

35. In the foregoing sub-sections various theories of implied succession as between the United Nations and the League in the field of mandates have been considered and shown to be fallacious. The real truth is however, that they all fly in the face of some of the most important facts concerning the founding of the United Nations;—for the idea of taking over from the League, of re-starting where it left off, was considered and rejected—expectedly so. The United States had never been a member of the League for reasons that were still remembered²⁵. The Soviet Union had been expelled in 1939. The “Axis” Powers, on the other hand, under their then fascist régimes, had been members, and so on. The League had a bad name politically. It had failed in the period 1931-1939 to prevent at least three very serious outbreaks of hostilities, and it had of course been powerless to prevent World War II. It was regarded in many quarters as something which—so far from being an “organised world com-of a function, and there is no principle of international law which would make it possible to say that, if an international organization becomes extinct, its functions automatically pass to another without special arrangements to that effect. The position was correctly stated by Judge Read in 1950, in the passage quoted in paragraph 22 above.

²⁵ It will be recalled that although President Wilson was one of the principal architects of the League Covenant,—and although the Covenant, instead of being a separate instrument had been made formally part of the Treaty of Versailles in the belief that the United States must ratify the latter, and thereby automatically become a member of the League,—this expectation was defeated by the action of the United States Senate in declining to ratify the Treaty, despite the fact that the United States was one of the “Principal Allied and Associated Powers” in whose name it was made. A separate Peace Treaty with Germany was concluded by the United States in 1921.

munity”—was a paramountly European institution dominated by “colonialist” influences. The United Nations, so it was felt, must represent an entirely fresh initiative. Although it could hardly fail in certain ways to resemble the League, there must be no formal link, no juridical continuity. The League had failed and the United Nations must not start under the shadow of a failure.

36. This is why absolutely no mention of the League is to be found in any part of the Charter. (Even in connection with mandates, formerly generally known as “League of Nations mandates”, the Charter makes no mention of the League. In Article 77, paragraph 1, and Article 80, paragraph 2—the only provisions in which mandates as such are mentioned—they are referred to as “territories now held under mandate” and “mandated . . . territories”.) This again is why the Charter was brought into force without any prior action to wind up the League, and regardless of the fact that it was still, and continued to be, in existence. It is not too much to say therefore that, in colloquial terms, the founders of the United Nations bent over backwards to avoid the supposed taint of any League connexion.

(ii) Assembly Resolution XIV of 12 February 1946

37. The same attitude of regarding the League as a quasi-untouchable was kept up when, after the Charter had come into force and the United Nations was definitely established, action was taken to put an end to the League and take over its physical and financial assets,—and to reach a final decision regarding its political and technical activities²⁶. This was done by the now well-known General Assembly Resolution XIV of 12 February 1946, the whole text of which will repay study and will, with one (non-pertinent) omission, be found set out verbatim on pages 625-626 of the 1962 volume of the Court’s Reports. The parts relevant to mandates (though not mentioning them by name) were as follows:

²⁶ A start had of course been made in the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations set up after the San Francisco Conference. To cite the joint dissenting Opinion written by Sir Percy Spender and myself in the 1962 phase of the South West Africa cases (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 532), the Summary Records of the Commission, in particular UNPC Committee 7, pp. 2-3 and 10-11, indicated that “the whole approach of the United Nations to the question of the activities of the League of Nations was one of great caution and indeed of reluctance . . . there was a definite rejection of any idea of . . . a general take-over or absorption of League functions and activities”.

“3. The General Assembly declares that the United Nations is willing in principle, and subject to the provisions of this resolution and of the Charter of the United Nations, to assume the exercise of certain functions and powers previously entrusted to the League of Nations and adopts the following decisions set forth in A, B and C below.”

Decisions A (“Functions pertaining to a secretariat”) and B (“Functions and powers of a technical and non-political character”) are irrelevant in the present connexion; but decision C, under which the question of mandates was regarded as coming, read as follows:

“C. Functions and Powers under Treaties, International Conventions, Agreements and other Instruments Having a Political Character ²⁷.

The General Assembly will itself examine, or will submit to the appropriate organ of the United Nations, any request from the parties that the United Nations should assume the exercise of functions or powers entrusted to the League of Nations by treaties, international conventions, agreements and other instruments having a political character ^{27a}.”

Commenting on this in 1950 (J.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 172), Judge Read, whose views I share, said, speaking of the Mandate for SW. Africa, that it involved “functions and powers of a political character” and that in substance decision C provided that the General Assembly would examine a request “that the United Nations should assume League functions as regards report, accountability and supervision over the South-West African Mandate”. He then continued:

“No such request has been forthcoming, and the General Assembly has not had occasion to act under decision C. The very existence of this express provision, however, makes it impossible to justify succession based upon implication”—(my italics).

38. Nor was the Assembly’s Resolution XIV of 12 February 1946 in any way the outcome of a hasty or insufficiently considered decision. It had been carefully worked out in the Preparatory Commission, and its committees and sub-committees, and it represented the culmination of a settled policy. The story is summarized on pages 536-538 of the 1962 joint dissenting Opinion already referred to (footnote 26 above) and a fuller version is given at pages 619-624 of the same volume of the Court’s Reports. In the discussion in the Preparatory Commission of the drafts prepared by its Executive Committee, of what eventually became Resolution XIV, the use of the word “transfer” [of League functions and activities], which nowhere appears in that resolution, was specifically objected to, and dropped, on the ground that it would seem to apply a “legal continuity that would not in fact exist”—my italics—(see UN doct. PC/LN/2, pp. 2-3, and PC/LN/10, pp. 10-11).

^{27, 27a} It was of course under the head of “Other instruments having a political character” that mandates were deemed to come.

(b) In particular as regards mandates

(i) Settled policy of preference for and reliance upon the trusteeship system

39. As regards mandates, no fewer than three proposals were made in the Preparatory Commission for the setting up of what would have been an interim régime for mandates under the United Nations. In the first place the Executive Committee recommended the creation of a “Temporary Trusteeship Committee” to deal with various interim matters until the trusteeship system was fully working, and amongst them “any matters that might arise with regard to the transfer to the United Nations of any functions and responsibilities hitherto exercised under the Mandates System”—(references will be found in the footnotes to pp. 536 and 537 of the I.C.J. Reports 1962). Had this proposal been proceeded with, it would have resulted in the creation of some sort of interim régime in respect of mandates, pending their being placed, or if they were not placed, under trusteeship. But in the Preparatory Commission itself, the idea of a temporary trusteeship committee met with various objections, mainly from the Soviet Union, and was not proceeded with. Instead, the Commission made quite a different kind of recommendation to the General Assembly, looking to the conversion of the mandates into trusteeships. This recommendation eventually emerged as Assembly Resolution XI of 9 February 1946, which will be considered in a moment.

40. Even more effective would have been the two United States proposals made in the Executive Committee on 14 October and 4 December 1945 respectively, which, had they been adopted, would have done precisely and expressly what it is now claimed was (by implication) done, even though these proposals were not proceeded with. Subject to differences of wording they were to the same effect, and their character can be seen from the following passage recommending that one of the functions of a temporary trusteeship committee should be (UN doct. PC/EX/92/Add. 1):

“... to undertake, following the dissolution of the League of Nations and of the Permanent Mandates Commission, the functions previously performed by the Mandates Commission in connection with receiving and examining reports submitted by Mandatory Powers with respect to such territories under mandate as have not been placed under the trusteeship system by means of trusteeship agreements, and until such time as the Trusteeship Council is established, whereupon the Council will perform a similar function”.

But after tabling these proposals the United States delegation did not further proceed with them. Instead, the Preparatory Commission recommended, and the Assembly adopted, Resolution XI mentioned at the end of the preceding numbered paragraph above. The full text of the relevant parts of this Resolution will be found on page 624 of I.C.J. Reports 1962. It was addressed to “States administering territories now held under mandate”; but all it did was to welcome the declarations made by “certain” of them as to placing mandated territories under trusteeship, and to “invite” all of them to negotiate trusteeship agreements for that purpose under Article 79 of the Charter;—not a word about the interim position,—not a word about the situation regarding any mandated territories in respect of which this invitation was not, and continued not to be, accepted. This piece of history confirms the existence of a settled policy of avoidance of mandates as such.

(ii) *The final League of Nations
Resolution of 18 April 1946*

41. Precisely the same attitude characterized the behaviour of those Members of the United Nations who were also Members of the League when, in their latter capacity, they attended the final Geneva meeting for the winding up of the League. Here again was an opportunity of doing something definite about mandates,—for (with the exception of Japan, necessarily absent) all the mandatories were present, and would be bound by any decisions taken,—since, according to the League voting rule, these had to be taken by unanimity. The terms of the resulting Resolution of 18 April 1946 will be considered in greater detail later, in connexion with the question whether they implied for the mandatories any undertaking of accountability to the United Nations in respect of their mandates as such. Suffice it for present purposes to say that after recognizing that, on the dissolution of the League, the latter’s “functions with respect to Mandated Territories will come to an end”, the Resolution merely noted that “Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter of the United Nations embody principles corresponding to those declared in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League”,—and then went on to take note of the “expressed intentions” of the mandatories to continue to administer their mandates “in accordance with the obligations contained” in them, “until other arrangements have been agreed between the United Nations and the respective [mandatories]”—again an allusion to, and a looking towards, the trusteeship system which, under the Charter, required the negotiation of trusteeship agreements. The interim position, and the position concerning any mandates in respect of which no trusteeship agreements were negotiated, was thus left to the operation of an ambiguous general formula, the precise effect of which (to be considered later) has been in dispute ever since.

42. The view that it was once more the trusteeship system that those concerned had in mind is borne out by the fact that the Board of Liquidation set up by the League Assembly to dispose of the League's assets—in handing over the archives of the League's mandates section to the United Nations—said in a report, the relevant part of which was entitled “Non-Transferable Activities, Funds and Services”—(my italics), that these archives “should afford valuable guidance to those concerned with the administration of the trusteeship [not the mandates] system”—my italics). It then also declared that “the mandates system inaugurated by the League has thus been brought to a close” (L. of N. doc. C.5.M.5., p. 20). In short, as Lord McNair said in 1950 (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 161), in a very pertinent verdict on the April 1946 resolution, it “... recognized that the functions of the League had come to an end; but it did not purport to transfer them . . . to the United Nations” (my italics)²⁸.

After adding that he did not see how this resolution could “be construed as having created a legal obligation . . . to make annual reports to the United Nations and to transfer to that Organization . . . the supervision of [the mandates]” he concluded that: “At the most, it could impose an obligation to perform those obligations . . . which did not involve the activity of the League”—(my italics).

43. There were however two further circumstances which suggest conclusively that no interim mandates régime was contemplated at Geneva—

(a) The “Chinese” draft—In the first place (and what must resolve all doubts) is the fact that quite a different type of resolution had previously been proposed but not proceeded with. This was what has become known in the annals of the SW. Africa complex of cases as the “Chinese” or “Liang” draft, from its source of origination, and it was in complete contrast to what was eventually adopted. It ran as follows:

²⁸ In other words there was (it cannot too often be repeated) no assignment, so that the acceptance of a new party to the Mandate (the United Nations) by way of novation needed the Mandatory's consent.

“The Assembly,

Considering that the Trusteeship Council has not yet been constituted and that all mandated territories under the League have not been transferred into trusteeship territories;

Considering that the League’s function of supervising mandated territories should be transferred to the United Nations, in order to avoid a period of inter-regnum in the supervision of the mandatory régime in these territories;—(my italics), Recommends that the mandatory powers as well as those administering ex-enemy mandated territories shall continue to submit annual reports to the United Nations and to submit to inspection by the same until the Trusteeship Council shall have been constituted.”

Although this proposal would have required amendment on account of certain technical errors and defects, it needs but a glance to see that, had the substance of it been adopted, it would have done precisely what has since so continually and tediously been claimed as having been done by the Resolution actually adopted on 18 April 1946. It would have imposed upon the mandatories an obligation at least to seek United Nations supervision and submit to it, if forthcoming, during what the proposal termed the “period of inter-regnum” in respect of mandates. Whether the United Nations would have accepted the suggested function—and naturally no resolution of the League could have compelled it to do so—is beside the point. The inescapable fact remains that, for whatever reason (and that reason does not appear upon the record) the proposal was not adopted; and matters cannot therefore, in law, be exactly the same as if it had been. If any further proof were needed it could be found in the fact that Dr. Liang himself, in speaking on the Resolution of 18 April 1946, as actually adopted, recalled his earlier (non-adopted) draft, and, after stating that the trusteeship articles of the United Nations Charter were “based largely upon the principles of the mandates system”, added “but the functions of the League in that respect were not transferred automatically to the United Nations”—(my italics). Therefore, he said, the Assembly of the League should “take steps to secure the continued application of [those] principles”. But in fact the Assembly of the League, like the Assembly of the United Nations, decided to rely for that purpose on the (non-obligatory) conversion of mandates into trusteeships, or else on Article 73 (e) of the Charter to which I now come.

(b) The reference to Chapter XI of the Charter in the Resolution of 18 April 1946—This is the second significant circumstance showing how minds were working at Geneva in April 1946. The Resolution of 18 April (paragraph 3—see ante paragraph 41) referred not only to Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter (trusteeships) but also to Chapter XI (non-self-governing territories). The reasons for this were given in the joint dissenting Opinion of 1962, at pages 541-545 of the 1962 volume of Reports, where attention was drawn to the virtual reproduction in the principal provision of Chapter XI (Article 73) of the language of Article 22, paragraph 1, of the League Covenant (both texts were set out for comparison in footnote 1 on p. 541 of that Opinion). The significance of the reference to Chapter XI in the Geneva Resolution—a reference that would otherwise have had no object—is as showing (i) that the delegates, including the various mandatories, regarded mandated territories as being in any event in the non-self-governing class, and (ii) that they regarded reporting under paragraph (e) of Article 73 as an alternative to the placing of mandated territories under trusteeship, at least in the sense of being something that would fill in the gap before the latter occurred, or if it did not occur at all. Furthermore, it had this advantage, that although it involved a less stringent form of reporting than specifically mandates or trusteeship reporting, and one moreover that did not involve actual accountability as such (see paragraph 59 below), it was obligatory for member States of the United Nations administering non-self-governing territories,—whereas the Charter created no obligation to place mandated or other territories under the trusteeship system. If therefore it be contended that there could not have been an intention to leave the “gap” totally unfilled, the answer is that this is how it was intended to be filled;—and there is evidence that several delegates and/or governments understood the matter in that sense (see I.C.J. Reports 1962, pp. 543-544). But equally clear it is that the gap was not intended to be filled on the basis that mandatories would, as mandatories, become accountable to the United Nations,—for if that had been the intention, the obvious course would have been followed of setting up an interim régime specifically for mandates as such, and inviting the United Nations to supervise it. There was therefore an implicit rejection of that course,—and if it is sought to explain matters (or explain them away) on the ground that the United Nations, being intent on the conversion of all mandates into trusteeships, would probably not have accepted the invitation, then surely this is an explanation that speaks for itself and can only confirm the view here put forward.

* * *

44. In relation to all these various attempts to bridge the gap between mandates and trusteeships, or alternatively to place continuing mandates on a more regular footing, the claim made in the Opinion of the Court is that their non-adoption did not necessarily imply a rejection of the underlying idea contained in them. I myself had always thought that the absolutely classic case of implied rejection was when a proposal had been considered and not proceeded with—it being, as a matter of law, quite irrelevant why²⁹. When an idea has been put forward, in much the same terms, on several different successive occasions, but not taken up, only the strongest possible contra-indications (if any there could be) would suffice to rebut the presumption—if not of rejection—at least of deliberate non-acceptation. If something is suggested but not provided for, the situation cannot be the same as if it had been. If there is a series of proposals substantially in the same sense, none of which is adopted, the quite different resolutions that eventually were adopted cannot be interpreted as having the same effect as those that were not. Even a non-jurist can hardly fail to admit the logic of these propositions.

(c) Reasons for and significance of the United Nations attitude on mandates

45. These persistent avoidances of any assumption of functions regarding mandates—even on an interim or temporary basis—are clear evidence of a settled policy of disinterest in anything to do with them that did not take the form of their conversion into trusteeships. This is borne out by an additional factor, namely that in spite of the considerations set out in paragraph 43 (b) above, the United Nations Assembly was, from the start, unwilling to allow that Article 73 of the Charter could be regarded as relating to mandated territories and, when it did receive reports about SW. Africa transmitted on that basis (see paragraphs 59 and 60 below), insisted on dealing with them through the Trusteeship Council. Individual episodes, occurring in isolation, might not have meant very much, but the cumulative effect of them, taken as a whole, is overwhelming, and can lead to only one conclusion; namely that the United Nations did not intend to take over any political function from the League except by special arrangements that were never made,—and that, as part of this policy, it did not want to become involved with mandates as such. This attitude was in fact understandable. In the first place, since the Charter made no express provision for the supervision of mandated territories by the United Nations, except if they were converted into trusteeships, which must be a voluntary act and could not be compelled, there was no legal basis upon which the Organization could claim to be entitled to supervise mandates not so converted. No separate machinery for doing so was instituted by the Charter, so that this would have had to be created ad hoc—with doubtful legality. To supervise mandates through the Trusteeship Council would have been tantamount to treating them as trust territories although they had not been placed under trusteeship, and did not have to be. In consequence, all efforts had to be concentrated on endeavouring to bring the various mandates into the trusteeship system.

²⁹ At international conferences proposals are often not proceeded with because their originators realize that they would not be agreed to,—and this of course speaks for itself. Alternatively, they are often not proceeded with because, even though desirable in themselves, they would involve difficulties, or entail certain corresponding disadvantages;—but in that event a choice is made, and as a matter of law it cannot afterwards be claimed that “in reality” the proposal was accepted, or that at least it was not “truly” rejected. Such pleas are of a purely subjective character,—and psychology is not law.

46. Secondly, there cannot be any shadow of doubt that (apart from the general unwillingness to take over League functions) the reason for the reluctance to assume any role relative to mandates was the fear that to do so would or might tend to perpetuate the mandates system by acting as an inducement to mandatories to maintain the status quo and refrain from submitting to the trusteeship system (see I.C.J. Reports 1962, pp. 540-541). In this connexion a point to note—though only an incidental one—is that the latter system was in certain respects more onerous for the mandatories than the mandates system—in particular as regards the character and composition of the body that would be advising the supervisory authority. In the case of mandates, this was the Permanent Mandates Commission, which was made up of independent experts of great experience in such matters, acting in their personal capacity, not as representatives of their governments, and not acting under official instructions. In the case of the trusteeship system it was to be the Trusteeship Council, a political body consisting of representatives of governments acting under instructions³⁰. Be that as it may, it was evidently thought desirable to refrain from giving mandatories any excuse for not transferring their mandated territories to the trusteeship system, such as they might well have considered themselves to have had, if an alternative in the shape of an ad hoc continuation of the mandates system had been afforded them. There was in addition the psychological factor of avoiding any suggestion, even indirect, that, possibly, not all mandated territories would be transferred to trusteeship, such as might have been conveyed by making provision for that eventuality.

(d) Conclusion as to the legal effects of this attitude

47. Such then were the reasons for the United Nations attitude about mandates. But to establish the reasons for something is not to cancel out the result, as the Opinion of the Court often seems to be trying to maintain. Reliance on the proposition that, to find a satisfactory explanation of why a proposal was not adopted, is equivalent to demonstrating that it was not really rejected;—and so it must be treated as if it had “really” been adopted, cannot enhance respect for law as a discipline.

³⁰ This of course was mitigated by the fact that half the members of the Trusteeship Council had to consist of representatives of administering Powers.

48. What in actual fact did occur in the United Nations, in the period 1945/1946, was that the Assembly, in full awareness of the situation, made an election—or choice. The election, the choice, was this: it was, so far as the United Nations was concerned, to be “trusteeship” (though not obligatory trusteeship). The taking over of mandates on any other basis was, in effect, rejected. That being so, it was not thereafter legally possible to turn round and say, as regards any mandated territory not placed under trusteeship, that although the United Nations had not been given the right to supervise the administration of the territory as a trust territory, it nevertheless had the right to supervise it as a mandated territory. This would simply be an indirect way of in effect making trusteeship compulsory, which it was not, and was never intended to be. It would be like allowing the man who draws the short straw to take the long one also! There is an unbridgeable inconsistency between the two positions. Despite various warnings, there was an expectation—or hope—that, in the end, trusteeship for all mandates would come about; but the risk that it might not do so had to be accepted. In the event this expectation or hope was realized except in the case of SW. Africa. The failure in this one case may have been very annoying or even exasperating,—but it could not afford juridical ground for deeming the United Nations ex post facto to be possessed of supervisory functions in respect of mandated territories which were not provided for in the Charter (outside the trusteeship system), and which the Organization deliberately, and of set purpose, refused to assume. In short, so far as SW. Africa was concerned, the United Nations backed the wrong horse,—but backing the wrong horse has never hitherto been regarded as a reason for running the race over again!

49. The basic mistake in 1945/1946 was of course the failure either to make the conversion of mandates into trusteeships obligatory for Members of the United Nations, or else expressly to set up an interim régime for non-converted mandates. But by the time political awareness of this mistake was fully registered, it was already legally too late;—neither of these things having been done (because in effect the United Nations had preferred to trust to luck) it is hardly possible now to treat the situation virtually as if one of them had been. There is surely a limit to which the law can admit a process of “having it both ways”. The cause of law is not served by failing to recognize that limit.

* * *

50. If the foregoing considerations are valid, it results that there is one and only one way in which the United Nations could have become invested with any supervisory function in respect of mandates, and that is by the consent of the mandatory concerned. Whether this was ever given by South Africa will now be considered.

5. The issue of consent to accountability and United Nations supervision

(a) General principles

(i) Absence of any true basis of consensus

51. The question of consent can strictly speaking be disposed of in one sentence,—for, once it is clear that at the time, the United Nations was not accepting, was not wanting to assume any function in respect of mandates as such, was in fact aiming at the total disappearance of the mandates system,—it follows that there was nothing for the mandatories to consent to in respect of mandates, unless they were willing to start negotiations for the conclusion of trusteeship agreements, which they were not obliged to do. As Judge Read said (in I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 171) speaking of events at an even later date (November 1946-May 1948), it was doubtful “whether the General Assembly was willing, at any stage [my italics], to agree to any arrangement that did not involve a trusteeship agreement . . .”. In these circumstances there was no basis of consensus for any arrangement involving United Nations supervision of mandates as mandates. It would have been necessary for the mandatory’s “consent” to have taken the form of a positive petition or plea, which would unquestionably have received the answer that if the mandatory wanted, or was prepared to accept, United Nations supervision, all it had to do was to negotiate a trusteeship agreement.

(ii) A Novation was involved

52. Several references have been made to this principle, which I believe has not, as such, been invoked in the previous proceedings before the Court except (implicitly) by Lord McNair and Judge Read in 1950. As has been seen in paragraphs 41 and 42 above, the League declared its functions with respect to mandates to be “at an end” and that the system “inaugurated by the League” had been “brought to a close”. There was no assignment in favour of the United Nations of mandates as such,—nor could there have been without the consent of the mandatories, for what would have been involved was a new and different party and therefore, in effect, something in the nature of novation of the obligation. It is well established in law that a novation which involves the acceptance of a new and different party, needs consent in order to be good as such;—and, moreover, consent unequivocally and unambiguously expressed, or at least evidenced by unequivocal acts or conduct. It is in the light of this requirement that the question of consent must be viewed.

(iii) “Statements of Intention” and their legal effect

53. Given what has been said in the preceding paragraph concerning what would be needed in the present context in order to afford adequate evidence of consent, there is no need here to consider in detail the many so-called statements of intention made on behalf of South Africa and other mandatories in 1945 and 1946, indicative of their general attitude as to the future of their mandates, from which implications have been sought to be drawn in the sense of an acceptance or recognition of a United Nations function in respect of mandates as such—i.e., mandates not converted into trusteeships,—for hardly any of them is free from ambiguity. I therefore agree with Lord McNair’s verdict in 1950 (I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 161) that there were “also many statements to the effect that the Union Government will continue to administer the Territory ‘in the spirit of the Mandate’. These statements are in the aggregate contradictory and inconsistent;” and, he continued, he did not “find in them adequate evidence that the Union Government has either assented to an implied succession by the United Nations . . . or has entered into a new obligation . . .”. I would however go further, and say that the various statements made, not only on behalf of South Africa but on behalf of the other mandatories (see next paragraph), taken broadly in the mass (many of them are given at various places from pp. 616-639 of the 1962 volume of the Court’s Reports) show the following common characteristics: (a) they are statements of general attitude, insufficient, and not purporting, to convey any definite undertaking; (b) if there was any undertaking, it was to continue to administer the mandated territories concerned in accordance with the mandates,—and the administration of a mandate is of course a separate thing from reporting about that process³¹; and (c) they none of them implied any recognition of the existence of a United Nations function relative to mandates, or any undertakings towards that Organization. I shall now consider the three episodes or complexes of episodes that have chiefly been relied on as indicative of South African recognition of accountability to the United Nations but which, in my view, do not justify that conclusion.

³¹ There was an inherent ambiguity in all those phrases whereby the mandatories said that they would continue to observe the mandates according to their terms, or to observe all the obligations of the mandates; because so far as the reporting obligation was concerned, this was, under the mandates, an obligation to report to the League Council, still in being up to 18 April 1946. Up to that date therefore, any mandatory was entitled to interpret its declaration in that sense, and after that date to interpret it as being no longer possible of execution on the basis of the mandate itself. What is quite certain is that, at the time, no one, whether mandatory or not, read these declarations as involving an undertaking then and there to report to the Assembly of the United Nations.

(b) Particular Episodes(i) The final League of Nations Resolution of 18 April 1946

54. Features (a), (b) and (c), as set out in the preceding paragraph, strongly characterized the Geneva proceedings ending in the final League of Nations Resolution of 18 April 1946³², on paragraphs 3 and 4 of which such heavy reliance was placed both in the 1950 and 1962 proceedings before the Court, and again now. Its effect has already been considered (paragraphs 41-43 above) in the related but separate context of the attitude of the States concerned on the question "mandates or trusteeships?" The question now is what if any undertakings for mandatories were implied by its paragraph 4 which is the operative one in the present connexion. This classic of ambiguity (text in footnote 32) consists essentially of a recital describing a situation. Since it merely "takes note" of something—namely the "expressed intentions of the [mandatories]", it does not of itself impose any obligations, so that the question is what these "expressed intentions" themselves were, and whether they amounted to binding undertakings, and if so to what effect. The statement made on behalf on South Africa is quoted in the next succeeding paragraph, and a summary of the key phrases used by the other mandatories will be found in footnote 2 on page 528 of the 1962 volume of the Court's Reports. Their vague and indeterminate character is immediately apparent³³. As summed up and described in paragraph 4 of the League resolution of 18 April 1946, the intentions expressed had nothing to do with the acceptance of United Nations supervision. They were, simply, "to administer [the territories] for the well-being and development of the peoples concerned". The further words "in accordance with the obligations contained in the respective mandates" at once involve the ambiguities to which attention has been drawn in paragraph 53 and footnote 31 above. These words need mean, and were almost certainly intended by

³² The full text of this resolution is given in footnote 1 on pp. 538-539 of the 1962 volume of the Court's Reports. It can be seen at a glance that only paragraphs 3 and 4 are relevant in the present context. The terms of paragraph 3 have in effect been cited in paragraph 41 above. Paragraph 4 was as follows:

"4. Takes note of the expressed intentions of the members of the League now administering territories under mandate to continue to administer them for the well-being and development of the peoples concerned in accordance with the obligations contained in the respective mandates until other arrangements have been agreed between the United Nations and the respective mandatory powers."

³³ On the question whether, in consequence of this, the mandatories were regarded as having entered into any definite agreement about the mandates, a detail worth noting is that whereas the various arrangements made between the League and the United Nations for the transfer of funds, buildings, archives, library, etc., were all registered under Article 102 of the Charter, nothing was registered in respect of mandates.

the mandatories to specify, no more than the obligations relative to administering “for the well-being and development . . .”, etc.,—for, as has already been noticed, reporting and supervision is about administration, not administration itself.

55. It is not upon flimsy and dubious foundations of this kind that binding undertakings (especially when dependent on unilateral declarations) can be predicated, more particularly where, as has been seen, a novation of an undertaking is involved, needing, in law, unambiguous consent. It is therefore instructive to see what, on this occasion, the “expressed intentions” of South Africa were, as stated by its delegate at Geneva on 9 April 1946 (League of Nations Official Journal, Special Supplement, No. 194, pp. 32-33). These were that, pending consideration of the South African desire, on the basis of the expressed wishes of the population, to incorporate SW. Africa in the territory of the Union (as it then was), the latter would in the meantime—

“ . . . continue to administer the territory scrupulously in accordance with the obligations of the mandate, for the advancement and promotion of the interests of the inhabitants, as she has done during the past six years when meetings of the Mandates Commission could not be held.

The disappearance of [the] organs of the League concerned with the supervision of mandates, primarily the Mandates Commission and the League Council, will necessarily preclude complete compliance with the letter of the mandate. The Union Government will nevertheless regard the dissolution of the League as in no way diminishing its obligations under the mandate, which it will continue to discharge with . . . full and proper appreciation of its responsibilities until such time as other arrangements are agreed upon concerning the future status of the territory”—(my italics).

For those who enjoy parlour games, an interesting hour could be spent in trying to decide exactly what this statement, equally a classic of ambiguity, amounted to as regards any South African acceptance of United Nations supervision,—for that, of course, is the point. The italicized passage clearly excludes the idea,—presaging as it does the continuation of a situation that had already lasted six years, in which no reports had been rendered, because there was no active League authority to which they could be rendered. The remainder of the statement, and in particular the phrase “as in no way diminishing its obligations under the mandate”, involves precisely those ambiguities and uncertainties to which attention has already been drawn (footnote 31). To me it seems the very prototype of the non-committal, so far as concerns any recognition of accountability to the United Nations, and I am unable to find in it any indication whatever of such recognition. I realize that on this matter, as on most others my view and the reasoning of the Court are operating on different wavelengths. Seeing in the South African statement a recognition of the existence of a continuing obligation towards the peoples of the mandated territory—the reasoning of the Court then makes the great leap;—because there was that degree of recognition there was also, and therefore a recognition of accountability to the United Nations. The lack of all rigour in this reasoning is evident. It involves exactly the same ellipses and telescopings of two distinct questions that characterized the reasoning of the Court in 1950, as already discussed in paragraphs 20-22 above. Nobody can have taken this declaration in that sense at the time, because everybody knew that United Nations supervision was to be exercised solely through the trusteeship system, and that there was no obligation to bring mandated territories within that system. This, to me, is one of the most decisive points in the whole case.

(ii) Question of the incorporation of SW. Africa as part of South Africa itself

56. The approach made by South Africa to the United Nations in November 1946 for the incorporation in its own territory of SW. Africa on the basis of the expressed wishes of the inhabitants who had been consulted, constitutes the only episode which can plausibly be represented as a recognition—not indeed of accountability to the United Nations on a specifically mandates basis (nor, as will be seen, was it taken by the Assembly in that sense)—but of the existence, on a political basis, of a United Nations interest in matters having a “colonial” aspect. It was also a convenient way of obtaining a large measure of general international recognition for such an incorporation³⁴. This last aspect of the matter—that what was being sought through the United Nations was “international” recognition—had already been mentioned in another part of the statement cited in the preceding paragraph above, made on behalf of South Africa at Geneva earlier in the year, in which it was announced that at the next session of the United Nations Assembly there would be formulated “the case for according South West Africa a status under which it would be internationally recognized as an integral part of the Union [of South Africa]”—my italics.

57. This was not the first mention of the matter. The possibility of incorporation had been foreshadowed in the most explicit terms as far back as 11 May 1945 in the long and detailed statement then made by the representative of South Africa in Committee II/4 of the San Francisco Conference, which there is every reason to believe³⁵ ended with a remark to the effect that the matter was being mentioned—

³⁴ This would of course be far from being the first historical example of seeking a political recognition of the incorporation of territory without there being any obligation to do so.

“... so that South Africa may not afterwards be held to have acquiesced in the continuance of the Mandate or the inclusion of the territory in any form of trusteeship under the new International Organisation”—(my italics).

From this, it was already clear that any definite approach to the United Nations incorporation, if and when made, would be a political one, on a voluntary basis, not in recognition of accountability.

58. When however the matter was raised in the Fourth Committee of the United Nations Assembly in November 1946 by Field-Marshal Smuts in person, it became clear that the probable reaction of the Committee would be a demand that the territory should be placed under trusteeship. Accordingly Field-Marshal Smuts later made a further statement in the course of which he said that:

“It would not be possible for the Union Government as a former mandatory to submit a trusteeship agreement in conflict with the clearly expressed wishes of the inhabitants. The Assembly should recognize that the implementation of the wishes of the population was the course prescribed by the Charter and dictated by the interests of the inhabitants themselves. If, however, the Assembly did not agree that the clear wishes of the inhabitants should be implemented, the Union Government could take no other course than to abide by the declaration it had made to the last Assembly of the League of Nations to the effect that it would continue to administer the territory as heretofore as an integral part of the Union, and to do so in the spirit of the principles laid down in the mandate”—(my italics).

Two things may be noted about this statement: First the speaker referred to South Africa as a “former” mandatory. Whether or not it was correct to speak of South Africa as not still being a mandatory is not the point. The point is that such a remark is quite inconsistent with any recognition of accountability in respect of the mandate. Secondly, when at the end of this passage, the speaker stated his Government's intention to continue to administer the territory "in the spirit" of the "principles" laid down in the Mandate—and it would be difficult to find a phrase less recognizatory of obligation—he did not mention, and was clearly not intending to include reporting of the kind indicated in the Mandate. Instead, he went on to state an intention to report on the non-self-governing territory basis of Article 73 (e) of the Charter (the effect of which will be considered in the next succeeding subsection); and what he said was that his Government would "in accordance with" (not, be it noted, Article 6 of the Mandate, but) "Article 73, paragraph (e), of the Charter" transmit reports to the Secretary-General "for information purposes",—this last phrase being the language of Article 73 (e) itself. He then concluded by saying that there was—

³⁵ The full text of this statement, which was only given summarily in the San Francisco records, appears in paragraph 4, Chapter VIII, of the South African written pleading in the present case. The text and provenance of the final observation, the inherently probable authenticity of which has never been challenged, appears in footnote 1 on page 9 of that pleading. The matter is also referred to in paragraph (5) on page 533 of the joint dissenting Opinion of 1962.

". . . nothing in the relevant clauses of the Charter, nor was it in the minds of those who drafted these clauses³⁶, to support the contention that the Union Government could be compelled to enter into a trusteeship agreement even against its own view or those of the people concerned".

And what was the reaction of the Assembly in its ensuing resolution 65 (I)?—was it to demand the submission of reports and the acceptance of supervision under Article 6 of the Mandate? Not at all,—it was to recommend that SW. Africa be placed under the trusteeship system. Clearly, no more than the Mandatory was the Assembly contemplating the exercise of any functions in respect of the territory on a mandates basis.

(iii) The Mandatory's offer to furnish Article 73 (e) type information

59. In the case of SW. Africa the Mandatory had no intention either of negotiating a trusteeship agreement or of submitting to United Nations supervision of the territory on a mandates basis;—and here again, it is not the ethics of this attitude that constitutes the relevant point, but the evidence it affords of lack of consent to any accountability to the United Nations. Nothing could make this—or the absence of all common ground—clearer than the next episode, starting with the statement made on behalf of South Africa in the Fourth Committee of the Assembly, on 27 September 1947, relative to the South African proposal, originally made in November 1946 (see previous paragraph), to transmit information of the same type as was required by Article 73 (e) of the Charter in respect of so-called "non-self-governing territories". Such information, given about colonies, protectorates, etc., does not imply accountability, and is not in the formal and technical sense “reporting”. The Report of the Fourth Committee on this occasion (dated 27 October 1947) describes the statement of the South African representative as follows:

³⁶ Amongst whom of course was the Field-Marshal himself.

“It was the assumption of his Government, he said, that the report [i.e., the information to be transmitted] would not be considered by the Trusteeship Council and would not be dealt with as if a trusteeship agreement had in fact been concluded. He further explained that as the League of Nations had ceased to exist, the right to submit petitions could no longer be exercised, since that right presupposes a jurisdiction which would only exist where there is a right of control and supervision, and in the view of the Union of South Africa no such jurisdiction was vested in the United Nations with regard to South West Africa”—(my italics).

What was said of petitions was a fortiori applicable in respect of reports of the kind contemplated by Article 6 of the Mandate. The italicized words constituted a general denial of United Nations jurisdiction.

60. There were further offers to furnish information on the same basis in the period 1947/1948, and one or two reports were actually transmitted. But all along the line statements were made on behalf of South Africa indicating clearly that this was done voluntarily and without admission of obligation. Thus at a Plenary Meeting of the Assembly on 1 November 1947 the representative of South Africa said that:

“... the Union of South Africa has expressed its readiness to submit annual reports for the information of the United Nations. That undertaking stands. Although these reports, if accepted, will be rendered on the basis that the United Nations has no supervisory jurisdiction in respect of this territory they will serve to keep the United Nations informed in much the same way as they will be kept informed in relation to Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73 (e) of the Charter”—(my italics).

And in a letter of 31 May 1948 to the Secretary-General an explicit restatement was given of the whole South African position as follows (UN doc., T/175, 3 June 1948, pp. 51-52):

“... the transmission to the United Nations for information on South West Africa, in the form of an annual report or any other form, is on a voluntary basis and is for purposes of information only. They [the Government] have on several occasions made it clear that they recognise no obligation to transmit this information to the United Nations, but in view of the wide-spread interest in the administration of the Territory, and in accordance with normal democratic practice, they are willing and anxious *to make available to the world*³⁷ such facts and figures as are readily at their disposal . . . The Union Government desire to recall that in offering to submit a report on South West Africa for the information of the United Nations, they did so on the basis of the provisions of Article 73 (e) of the Charter. This Article calls for ‘statistical and other information of a technical nature’ and makes no reference to information on questions of policy. In these circumstances the Union Government do not consider that information on matters of policy, particularly future policy, should be included in a report (or in any supplement to the report) which is intended to be a factual and statistical account of the administration of the Territory over the period of a calendar year. Nevertheless, the Union Government are anxious to be as helpful and as co-operative as possible and have, therefore, on this occasion replied in full to the questions dealing with various aspects of policy. The Union Government do not, however, regard this as creating a precedent. Furthermore, the rendering of replies on policy should not be construed as a commitment as to future policy or as implying any measure of accountability to the United Nations on the part of the Union Government. In this connexion the Union Government have noted that their declared intention to administer the Territory in the spirit of the mandate has been construed in some quarters as implying a measure of international accountability. This construction the Union Government cannot accept and they would again recall that the League of Nations at its final session in April 1946, explicitly refrained from transferring its functions in respect of mandates to the United Nations”³⁸—(my italics).

And then again in the Fourth Committee of the Assembly in November 1948 (Official Record of the 76th Meeting, p. 288), it was stated that:

“. . . the Union could not admit the right of the Trusteeship Council to use the report for purposes for which it had not been intended: still less could the Trusteeship Council assume for itself the power claimed in its resolution, i.e., ‘to determine whether the Union of South Africa is adequately discharging its responsibilities under the terms of the mandate . . . Furthermore, that power was claimed in respect of a territory which was not a trust territory and in respect of which no trusteeship agreement existed. The South African delegation considered that in so doing the Council had exceeded its powers"—(my italics).

³⁷ The use of such expressions as “wide-spread interest” and “make available to the world” confirms the view taken in paragraph 56 above as to the basis of the South African approach to the United Nations on the subject of incorporation.

³⁸ See on this matter paragraph 42 above, and Lord McNair’s pronouncement in the same sense two years later, as there quoted.

Since however the Assembly persisted in dealing with the reports through the Trusteeship Council, they were subsequently discontinued. It is of course evident that the "parties", so to speak, were completely at logger-heads. But no less clear is it (a) that the Assembly would agree to nothing, except on a trusteeship basis, and (b) that South Africa would agree to nothing that involved recognition of an obligation of accountability to the United Nations. In consequence there was no agreement, no consent.

(c) Conclusions as to consent

61. Whatever may be thought of the South African attitude from a wider standpoint than that of law, there can surely be no doubt as to what, in law, the character of that attitude was. In the face of the statements above set-out, it is impossible to contend that there was any recognition, or acceptance, of accountability to the United Nations as a duty arising for the Mandatory upon the dissolution of the League. There was in fact an express rejection of it. Consequently, in a situation in which, for the reasons given in paragraphs 51 and 52 above, nothing short of positive expressions of recognition or acceptance would have sufficed, there were in fact repeated positive denials and rejections. This being so, all attempts to imply it must fail in principle on a priori grounds; for implications are valid only in situations of relative indeterminacy where, if there are no very positive indications "for", there are also no very positive ones "against". Where however, as here, there are positive indications "against", mere implications "for" cannot prevail. Recognition of accountability could be attributable to South Africa only on the basis of conduct not otherwise explicable. In fact, it was both otherwise explicable, and repeatedly explained.

* * *

62. An important point of international legal order is here involved. If, whenever in situations of this kind a State voluntarily, and for reasons of policy, brings some matter before an international body, it is thereby to be held to have tacitly admitted an obligation to do so (as it has quite erroneously been sought to maintain in connexion with the United Kingdom's reference of the Palestine question to the United Nations in 1948), then there must be an end of all freedom of political action, within the law, and of all confidence between international organizations and their member States.

63. Exactly the same is applicable to attempts to read binding undertakings into the language of what are really only statements of policy, as the declarations made at one time or another by the various mandatories essentially were. Clearly in the formative period of the United Nations and the dissolution of the League, the question of mandates was a matter of general interest. They were bound to be discussed,—the mandatories were bound to make known in a general way what their views and attitudes were. Clearly some conclusion had to be reached about their future. But equally clearly, if not more so, is the fact that the conclusion reached as to their future was that they ought to be placed under the trusteeship system, and that the United Nations should not have anything to do with them as mandates. In other words United Nations supervision was to be exercised through the trusteeship not the mandates system. At the same time no legal obligation was created under the Charter for mandatories to convert their mandates into trusteeships. Therefore it is not now legally possible (SW. Africa not having been placed under trusteeship and there having been no legal obligation so to place it) to contend that the United Nations is entitled none the less to exercise supervision on a mandates basis. Such a contention constitutes a prime example of a process to which I will not give a name, but which should not form part of any self-respecting legal technique.

6. General conclusion on Section A

64. Since for all these reasons the United Nations as an Organization (including therefore both the General Assembly and the Security Council) never became invested with the powers and functions of the Council of the former League in respect of mandates, in any of the possible ways indicated in paragraph II above, I must hold that it was incompetent to revoke South Africa's mandate, irrespective of whether the League Council itself would have had that power. It is nevertheless material to enquire whether the latter did have it,—for if not, then cadit quaestio even if the United Nations had inherited. To this part of the subject I now accordingly turn.

SECTION B

EVEN IF THE UNITED NATIONS BECAME INVESTED WITH THE POWERS OF THE FORMER COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, THESE DID NOT INCLUDE ANY POWER OF UNILATERAL REVOCATION OF A MANDATE

1. Lack of competence of the United Nations to exercise any other or greater supervisory powers in respect of mandates than were possessed by the League of Nations

65. On the assumption—or postulate as it really has to be—that, contrary to the conclusion reached in the preceding section (Section A), the United Nations did inherit—or did otherwise become invested with—a supervisory function in respect of those mandates which remained mandates and were not converted into United Nations trusteeships;—it then becomes necessary to enquire what was the nature and scope (or content) of that function, as it was exercised, or exercisable, by the Council of the League of Nations. Such an enquiry is rendered necessary because of an elementary yet fundamental principle of law. In so far as (if at all) the United Nations could legitimately exercise any supervisory powers, these were perforce derived powers—powers inherited or taken over from the League Council³⁹. They could not therefore exceed those of the Council,—for derived powers cannot be other or greater than those they derive from. There could not have been transferred or passed on from the League what the League itself did not have,—for nemo dare potest quod ipse non habet, or (the corollary) nemo accipere potest id quod ipse donator nunquam habuit. This incontestable legal principle was recognized and applied by the Court in 1950, and was the basis of its finding (I.C.J. Reports 1950, at p. 138) that:

“The degree of supervision to be exercised by the General Assembly should not therefore exceed that which applied under the Mandates System, and should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed in this respect by the Council of the League of Nations.”

This finding was specifically affirmed in the later Voting Procedure and Oral Petitions cases (1955 and 1956), both of which indeed turned on whether the way in which the Assembly was proposing or wanting to interpret and conduct its supervisory role in certain respects, would be consistent with the principle thus enunciated. Furthermore, in the second of these cases the Court gave renewed expression to the principle. Referring to its original (1950) Opinion, it said (I.C.J. Reports 1956, at p. 27):

³⁹ It goes without saying that even if, contrary to the conclusion reached in the previous section, South Africa consented or can be deemed to have consented, to any exercise of supervisory powers by the United Nations, it can never in any circumstances have consented, or be deemed to have consented, to the exercise of more extensive powers than those of the League.

“In that Opinion the Court . . . made it clear that the obligations of the Mandatory were those which obtained under the Mandates System. Those obligations could not be extended beyond those to which the Mandatory had been subject by virtue of the provisions of Article 22 of the Covenant and of the Mandate for South West Africa under the Mandates System. The Court stated therefore that the degree of supervision to be exercised by the General Assembly should not exceed that which applied under the Mandates System [and that] the degree of supervision should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed by the Council of the League . . .”

66. The correctness of this view has never been challenged, and seems on principle unchallengeable. It follows inevitably therefore that if the League possessed no power of unilateral revocation of a mandate⁴⁰ the United Nations could not have become subrogated to any such power. It equally follows on the procedural side—(and here there is an important connexion)—that if, under the mandates system as conducted by the League, the position was that the supervisory body, the League Council, could not bind a mandatory without its consent, then neither could the organs of the United Nations do so, whether it was the General Assembly or the Security Council that was purporting so to act. In short, let the Assembly—or for that matter the Security Council—be deemed to have all the powers it might be thought that either organ has, or should have,—these still could not, in law, be exercised in the field of *mandates*⁴¹ to any other or greater effect than the League Council could have done. (Both organs are of course also subject to Charter limitations on their powers which will be considered in main Section C below.)

⁴⁰ The “indefinite” article—“a” not “the” mandate is here employed of set purpose,—for whatever the position was as regards the League’s powers of revoking a mandate, it was the same for all mandates, not merely that for SW. Africa. The view that the latter could unilaterally be revoked entails that the various Australian, Belgian, French, Japanese, New Zealand and United Kingdom mandates equally could be.

⁴¹ What the Security Council might be able to do not on a mandates but on a peace-keeping basis is considered separately in paragraphs 110-116 below.

2. The League had no power of unilateral revocation, express or implied

(a) Presumption against the existence of such a power

67. The case for deeming League of Nations mandates to have been subject to a power of unilateral revocation by the Council of the League does not rest on any provision of the mandates themselves, or of the League Covenant. (These indeed, as will be seen presently, imply the exact opposite.) The claim is one which, as noted earlier, is and can only be advanced on the assumption of fundamental breaches of the mandate concerned, such as, if the case were one of a private law contract for instance, could justify the other party in treating it as terminated⁴². The claim therefore rests entirely on the contention that, in the case of institutions such as the League mandates were, there must exist an inherent power of revocability in the event of fundamental breach, even if no such power is expressed;—that indeed there is no need to express it. This is in fact the Court's thesis.

* * *

68. In support of this view, comparisons are drawn with the position in regard to private law contracts and ordinary international treaties and agreements, as to which it may be said that fundamental breaches by one party will release the other from its own obligations⁴³, and thus, in effect, put an end to the treaty or contract. The analogy is however misleading on this particular question, where the contractual situation is different from the institutional,—so that what may be true in the one case cannot simply be translated and applied to the other without inadmissible distortions (see footnotes 42 and 43).

⁴² Note the intentional use of the phrase "in treating it as terminated" and not "in putting an end to it". There is an important conceptual difference. Strictly speaking, all that one party alleging fundamental breaches by the other can do, is to declare that it no longer considers itself bound to continue performing its own part of the contract, which it will regard as terminated. But whether the contract has, in the objective sense, come to an end, is another matter and does not necessarily follow (certainly not from the unilateral declaration of that party)—or there would be an all too easy way out of inconvenient contracts.

⁴³ The question at once arises who or what would, in the case of mandates, be the other party, and what would be its obligations from which it could claim release because of the mandatory's breaches? In the case of a mandate what obligations are there other than the mandatory's? How and by whom is the existence of fundamental breaches to be established with the effect that would attach to a judgment (not opinion) of a competent court of law (not a lay political organ)?

69. There is no doubt a genuine difficulty here, inasmuch as a régime like that of the mandates system seems to have a foot both in the institutional and the contractual field. But it is necessary to adhere to at least a minimum of consistency. If, on the basis of contractual principles, fundamental breaches justify unilateral revocation, then equally is it the case that contractual principles require that a new party to a contract cannot be imposed on an existing one without the latter's consent (novation). Since in the present case one of the alleged fundamental breaches⁴⁴ is precisely the evident non-acceptance of this new party, and of any duty of accountability to it (such an acceptance being ex hypothesi, on contractual principles, not obligatory), a total inconsistency is revealed as lying at the root of the whole Opinion of the Court in one of its most essential aspects.

70. If, in order to escape this dilemma—and it is not the only one⁴⁵—a shift is made into the international institutional field, what is at once apparent is that the entities involved are not private persons or corporate entities, but sovereign States. Where a sovereign State is concerned, and where also it is not merely a question of pronouncing on the legal position, but of ousting that State from an administrative role which it is physically in the exercise of, it is not possible to rely on any theory of implied or inherent powers. It would be necessary that these should have been given concrete expression in whatever are the governing instruments. If it is really desired or intended, in the case of a sovereign State accepting a mission in the nature of a mandate, to make the assignment revocable upon the unilateral pronouncement of another entity, irrespective of the will of the State concerned⁴⁶, it would be essential to make express provision for the exercise of such a power.

71. Nor would that be all,—for provision would also need to be made as to how it was to be exercised,—since clearly, upon its exercise a host of legal and practical questions would at once arise, requiring speedy solution, and possibly demonstrating the existence of potential problems more serious than those supposed to be solved by the revocation. To leave such matters in the air—to depend on the chance operation of unexpressed principles or rules—is an irresponsible course, and not the way things are done. If the possibility of changes of mandatory had really been contemplated, the normal method would have been to provide for a review after an initial period of years, or at stated intervals,—and even this would not imply any general or unconstrained power of revocation, but rather an ordered process of periodical re-examination in which the mandatory itself would certainly participate.

⁴⁴ Alleged breaches that have not in any event been properly established—see paragraphs 2-5 at the start of the present Opinion.

⁴⁵ For instance, according to ordinary contractual principles, and subject to qualifications not here relevant, the death or extinction of one of the parties to a contract normally puts an end to it and releases the other party from any further obligations except such as have already accrued due but remain undischarged. Applied to mandates this would have meant their termination upon the extinction of the League of Nations, and the discharge from all further obligations of the mandataries, who would have remained in a situation of physical occupation from which they could not in practice have been dislodged.

⁴⁶ If it be objected that no State would willingly or knowingly accept such conditions, I can only agree,—but this in fact reinforces and points up the whole of my argument. The obvious absurdity of the whole idea at once emerges.

* * *

72. In consequence, within a jurisprudential system involving sovereign independent States and the major international organizations whose membership they make up, there must be a natural presumption against the existence of any such drastic thing as a power of unilaterally displacing a State from a position or status which it holds⁴⁷. No implication based on supposed inherency of right—but only concrete expression in some form—could suffice to overcome this presumption,—for what is in question here is not a simple finding that international obligations are considered to have been infringed, but something going much further and involving action—or purported action—of an executive character on the objective plane. It is as if the King of Ruritania were declared not only to be in breach of Ruritania's international obligations but also, on that account, be no longer King of Ruritania. The analogy is not claimed to be exact, but it will serve to make the point,—namely that infringements of a mandate might cause the mandatory concerned to be in breach of its international obligations but could not cause it thereby to cease to be the mandatory or become liable to be deposed as such, at the fiat of some other authority, unless the governing instruments so provided or clearly implied. In the present case they not only do not do so but, as will be seen, indicate the contrary.

(b) Positive indications negating the notion of revocability:—
 (1) based on the terms of the relevant instruments and certain applicable principles of interpretation

(i) Essentially non-peremptory character of the mandates system

73. This point will be more fully dealt with in connexion with the basic voting rule of the League which, with certain exceptions not applicable in the case of mandates, was that of unanimity including the vote of the interested party, and therefore of the mandatory concerned. It is mentioned here by way of introduction as being an essential piece of background knowledge,—for since it was the case that mandatories could not in the last resort become bound by the decisions of the League Council unless they agreed with them, or at least tacitly acquiesced in, or did not oppose them⁴⁸, the system was necessarily non-peremptory in character;—and in relation to such a system there is obviously an element of total unreality in speaking of a power of unilateral revocation,—for any decision to revoke would itself, in order to be valid, have required the concurrence of the mandatory⁴⁹. It could not therefore have been unilateral. Any other view involves an inherent logical contradiction.

⁴⁷ It is not that sovereign States are above the law, but that the law itself takes account of the fact that they are not private citizens or private law entities.

(ii) Limited scope of the so-called supervisory function as exercised by the League Council

74. As was mentioned early in this Opinion (paragraph 14 above), no supervisory role in respect of mandates was, in terms, conferred upon the League Council, or any other organ of the League, either by the relevant mandate itself or by Article 22 of the League Covenant, which established the mandates system as a régime, and indicated its character in considerable detail—but not in this particular respect. The supervisory role or function was left to emerge entirely—or virtually so—as a kind of deduction from, or corollary of the obligation of the mandatory concerned to furnish annual reports to the Council. It is therefore to the character of that obligation to which regard must be had in order to establish what kind and scope of supervision could legitimately be inferred as flowing from it.

Applicable principle of interpretation

Where a right or power has not been the subject of a specific grant, but exists only as the corollary or counterpart of a corresponding obligation, this right or power is necessarily defined by the nature of the obligation in question, and limited in its scope to what is required to give due effect to such correlation.

⁴⁸ In fact, strictly speaking, there could not, without the concurrence of the mandatory, be a decision as such: there could only be something in the nature of a (non-binding) recommendation. But the mandatory could refrain from exercising its vote.

⁴⁹ The principle nemo iudex esse potest in sua propria causa clearly cannot apply so as to defeat the voting rules laid down in the constitutions of international organizations;—or else, to take an obvious example, the five permanent Members of the United Nations Security Council would be unable to exercise their “veto” in regard to any matter involving their own interests;—whereas one of the objects of giving them the veto was, precisely (apart from the specific exception contained in Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter, as also the analogous one in the League Covenant—see paragraph 80 below), to enable them to protect those interests.

75. All the various mandates (with one exception not here pertinent⁵⁰, and subject to minor differences of language) dealt with the reporting obligation in the same way. Citing that for SW. Africa, it was provided (Article 6) that the Mandatory was to render to the Council of the League “an annual report to the satisfaction of the Council⁵¹ containing full information with regard to the territory and indicating the measures taken to carry out the obligations assumed . . .”. This was a reflection and expansion of paragraph 7 of Article 22 of the Covenant, which provided for an annual report to the Council “in reference to the territory committed to [the Mandatory’s] charge”. The only other relevant clause was paragraph 9 of Article 22, which provided for the setting up of what became the Permanent Mandates Commission, “to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates”. Later, by special arrangement, written petitions from the inhabitants of the mandated territories, forwarded through the mandatories, could also be received and examined.

* * *

76. It is clear therefore that the sole real specific function of the Council was (via the Permanent Mandates Commission) to “receive and examine” these reports and petitions. The Council could require that the reports should be to its satisfaction, namely “contain full information” about the mandated territory, and “indicate the measures taken” by the mandatory, etc. It would also be a natural corollary that the Council could comment on these reports, indicate to the mandatory what measures it thought wrong or inadequate, suggest other measures, etc.,—but in no case with any binding effect unless the mandatory agreed. The Council could exhort, seek to persuade and even importune; but it could not require or compel,—and it is not possible, from an obligation which, on its language, is no more than an obligation to render reports of a specified kind, to derive a further and quite different obligation to act in accordance with the wishes of the authority reported to. This would need to be separately provided for, and it is quite certain that none of the various mandatories ever understood the reporting obligation in any such sense as that, and equally certain that they never would have undertaken it if they had.

⁵⁰ That of Iraq, which was differently handled—see joint dissenting Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 498, n. 1.

⁵¹ The phrase “to the satisfaction of the Council” cannot have related to the measures reported on, for the mandatory only had to render one annual report, and could not know, at the reporting stage, what view the Council would take as to those measures. Nor did the mandatory subsequently revise its report, though it might revise its measures. The object of the report was, precisely, to inform the Council about these;—and, considered as a piece of reporting, the report was necessarily satisfactory if it contained full and accurate information as to what was being done, so that the Council, having thus been put in possession of all the facts, would, on the basis of the report, be able to indicate to the mandatory whether it approved of the measures concerned or what other or additional measures it advocated.

77. In other words, the supervisory function, as it was contemplated for League purposes, was really a very limited one—a view the principle of which was endorsed by Sir Hersch Lauterpacht in the Voting Procedure case when, speaking of United Nations trusteeships (but of course the same thing applies a fortiori to the case of mandates) he said this (I.C.J. Reports 1955, p. 116):

“... there is no legal obligation, on the part of the Administering Authority, to give effect to a recommendation of the General Assembly to adopt or depart from a particular course of legislation or any particular administrative measure. The legal obligation resting upon the Administering Authority is to administer the Trust Territory in accordance with the principles of the Charter and the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement, but not necessarily in accordance with any specific recommendation of the General Assembly or of the Trusteeship Council”—(my italics).

* * *

78. Such then was the real and quite limited nature of the supervisory function to which the General Assembly became subrogated, if it became subrogated to any function at all in respect of mandates. It was, as the term implies, strictly a right of “supervision”; it was not a right of control—it did not comprise any executive power;—and therefore clearly could not have comprised a power of so essentially executive a character as that of revocation. Between a function of supervision (but not of control) and a power to revoke a mandate and, so to speak, evict the mandatory—and to do this unilaterally without the latter’s consent—there exists a gulf so wide as to be unbridgeable. It would involve a power different not only (and greatly) in degree, but in kind. This is a consideration which, in the absence of express provision for revocation, makes it impossible to imply such a power,—and indeed excludes the whole notion of it, as being something that could not have fallen within the League Council’s very limited supervisory role, and accordingly cannot fall within that of the United Nations Assembly—assuming the latter to have any supervisory role.

(iii) The League Council's voting rule

79. The views just expressed are more than confirmed by the League Council's voting rule, as embodied in paragraph 5 of Article 4 of the Covenant in combination with paragraph 1 of Article 5 (texts in footnote 52). The effect, in the case of all matters involving mandates, was to enable the mandatories, if not already members of the Council (as several invariably were), to attend if they wished, and to exercise a vote which might operate as a veto. No exception was provided for the possibility of a revocation, and no such exception can be implied from the fact that mandatories did not always attend the Council when invited to do so, or might abstain on the vote, or that certain devices might be employed on occasion to avoid direct confrontations between them and the other members of the Council. The fact that there may be no recorded case of the actual use of this veto does not alter the legal position,—it merely shows how well the system worked in the hands of reasonable people. None of this however can alter the fact that mandatories always had the right to attend and exercise their votes. The existence of this voting situation was confirmed by the Court not only in its Judgment of 1966 but also in that of 1962 (I.C.J. Reports 1966, pp. 44-45; and I.C.J. Reports 1962, pp. 336-337)⁵³. It is obvious that a situation in which the League Council could not impose its views on the mandatories without their consent, is with difficulty reconcilable with one in which it

⁵² Article 4, paragraph 5: "Any Member of the League not represented on the Council shall be invited to send a Representative to sit as a member [italics mine] at any meeting of the Council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that Member of the League."

Article 5, paragraph 1: "Except where otherwise expressly provided in this Covenant . . . decisions at any meeting of the . . . Council shall require the agreement of all the Members of the League represented at the meeting"—(italics mine).

⁵³ e.g. (pp. 336-337):

" . . . approval meant the unanimous agreement of all the representatives [at the Council meeting] including that of the Mandatory who, under Article 4, paragraph 5, of the Covenant, was entitled to send a representative to such a meeting to take part in the discussion and to vote".

And again (p. 337):

"Under the unanimity rule (Articles 4 and 5 of the Covenant), the Council could not impose its own view on the Mandatory."

It may seem surprising at first sight that the Court, in its 1962 composition, was so ready to admit, and even to stress, the existence of this situation. The explanation is that it was basing itself in the absence of effective "administrative supervision" in the League system as one ground for postulating the existence of "judicial supervision" in the form of a right, on the part of any Member of the League dissatisfied with the conduct of a mandate, to have recourse to the former Permanent Court and, since then, to the International Court of Justice as set up under the United Nations Charter. It follows that although the present (1971) Opinion of the Court is wholly in line with the type of conclusion reached by the Court in 1962, it is wholly at variance with the 1962 reasoning just described; for that reasoning must, in logic, lead to the result indicated above at the end of paragraph 79.

could unilaterally revoke their mandates without their consent;—and therefore, a fortiori, with the idea that the United Nations possessed such a power.

Applicable Principle of Interpretation

Where a provision [such as the League Council's voting rule] is so worded that it can only have one effect, any intended exceptions, in order to be operative, must be stated in terms.

80. This principle of interpretation is, as it happens, well illustrated, and the view expressed in the preceding paragraph is given the character of a virtual certainty, by the fact that (though not in the sphere of mandates) the League Covenant did specifically provide for certain exceptions to the basic League unanimity rule,—namely, in particular under paragraphs 4, 6, 7 and 10 of Article 15, and paragraph 4 of Article 16, dealing with matters of peace-keeping⁵⁴. This serves to show that those who framed the Covenant fully realized that there were some situations in which to admit the vote of the interested party would be self-defeating—and these they provided for. They do not seem to have thought so in the case of mandates, nor was such a suggestion ever made in the course ⁵⁴ It has been contended that the power given to the League Council by paragraph 4 of Article 16 of the Covenant to expel a Covenant-breaking member State (though in my opinion relating only to the peace-keeping undertakings of the Covenant—see paragraph 1 of this same Article 16) afforded a way by which a mandate could be revoked. Since, according to the express terms of paragraph 4 of Article 16, the concurring vote of the expelled State was not requisite for an expulsion order, a mandatory in breach of its obligations could first be expelled, and then, because it had ceased to be a Member of the League, a decision to revoke its mandate could be taken without it.

This ingenious contention however (about which there may be factual doubts not worth troubling about here) misses the real point;—for if it would not have been possible to get rid of a mandatory without going to these elaborate lengths, what better demonstration could there be that revocability, whether on a basis of inherency or otherwise, simply did not exist within the four corners of the Covenant or the mandates, in respect of any mandatory in the normal situation of still being a Member of the League? That a mandatory might lose its rights if it ceased to be a Member could in practice act as a deterrent, but has no bearing on the juridical issue of what its rights and liabilities were as a Member.

Exactly the same principle applies in regard to another contention based on the circumstance that, under Article 26, the Covenant could be amended (though only by a vote that had to include the unanimous vote of all the members of the League Council). True, the Covenant could thus be amended;—but in fact it was not amended: therefore it is the unamended Covenant that governs. It is difficult to know how to deal with this type of argument which, juridically, cannot be taken seriously, except as a clutching at straws.

of the League's dealings with mandates. It can only be concluded that terminations or changes of administration were never contemplated, except on a basis of agreement.

(iv) Contemporaneous consideration and rejection of the idea of revocability

81. Nor was it in any way a question of a mere oversight. Earlier proposals for a mandates system, in particular as put forward by President Wilson on behalf of the United States, did contain provision for the replacement of mandatories, or for the substitution of another mandatory,—and these things (contrary to what is implied in the Opinion of the Court) could of course only be done by revoking (or they would amount to a revocation of) the original mandate. Even the possibility of breaches was not overlooked, for the Wilson proposals also provided, as is correctly stated in the Opinion of the Court, for a “right to appeal to the League for the redress or correction of any breach of the mandate”. There can however be no point in following the Opinion of the Court into a debate as to the precise period and the precise context in which the idea of revocability was discussed,—because what is beyond doubt is that, whether on the basis of President Wilson's proposal, or of some other proposal, it was discussed. The proof of this is something of which the Court's Opinion makes no mention, namely that objections were entertained to the notion of revocability by all the eventual holders of “C” mandates, and by the representatives of governments destined to hold most of the “A” and “B” mandates—in particular by M. Simon on behalf of France and Mr. Balfour (as he then was) on behalf of Great Britain, both of whom pointed out the difficulties, economic and other, that would arise if mandatories did not have complete security of tenure⁵⁵. The idea was accordingly not proceeded with, and the final text of the mandates, and of Article 22 of the Covenant, contained no mention of it. This makes it quite impossible in law to infer that there nevertheless remained some sort of unexpressed intention that a right of revocation should exist, for this would lead to the curious legal proposition that it makes no difference whether a thing is expressed or not. Yet the classic instance of the creation of an irrebuttable presumption in favour of a given intention is, precisely, where a different course has been proposed but not followed. The motives involved are juridically quite irrelevant, but were in this case clear⁵⁶.

⁵⁵ At the meetings of the Council of Ten on 24-28 January 1919, and subsequently. See Foreign Relations of the United States: The Paris Peace Conference, Vol. III, pp. 747-768. It was Mr. Balfour who pointed out (pp. 763-764) that although plenty of consideration had been given to the League aspect of the matter, very little had been given to the position of the mandatories, and that the system could only work if the latter had security of tenure. M. Simon pointed out (p. 761) that mandatories would have little inducement to develop the mandated territories if their future was uncertain.

Applicable Principle of Interpretation

Where a particular proposal has been considered but rejected, for whatever reason, it is not possible to interpret the instrument or juridical situation to which the proposal related as if the latter had in fact been adopted.

82. The episode described in the preceding paragraph directly illustrates and confirms the view expressed in paragraphs 70-72 above. When Statesmen such as President Wilson thought of making mandates revocable (which could only be in a context of possible breaches) they were not content to rely on any inherent principle of revocability but made a definite proposal which, had it been adopted, would have figured as an article in the eventual governing instrument, or instruments. Since however the idea met with specific objections, it was not proceeded with and does not so figure. Therefore to treat the situation as being exactly the same as if it nevertheless did, is inadmissible and contrary to the stability and objectivity of the international legal order. Again, the process of having it both ways is evident.

(v) The "integral portion" clause

83. Article 22 of the League Covenant drew a clear distinction between the "C" mandated territories and the other ("A" and "B") territories, inasmuch as in its paragraph 6 it described the former as being territories that could "be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory",—and a clause to that effect figured

⁵⁶ For sheer audacity, it would be hard to equal the attempts made in the course of the present proceedings to represent M. Simon's statement to the effect that every mandate would be revocable and there could be no guarantee of its continuance (which of course would have been the case on the basis of the earlier idea which M. Simon was contesting), as affording evidence of an intention that mandates should be revocable; and that this was only not proceeded with because of a desire to be "tactful" towards the mandatories,—although it is perfectly clear on the face of the record that M. Simon (and Mr. Balfour) were objecting to the idea of revocability,—not on grounds of its want of tact, but for economic and other reasons of a highly concrete character,—i.e., France and Great Britain, no less than the "C" mandatories, were not prepared to accept mandates on such a basis.

in the "C" mandates accordingly (text in footnote 57). This distinction was not, however, fully maintained; for a similar clause eventually appeared in the "B" mandates as well,—though without warrant for this in the Covenant. But this does not invalidate the point to be made because, as has been seen in the previous sub-section (paragraph 81), the notion of revocability was as unacceptable to the "B" as to the "C" mandatories. The point involved is that the "integral portion" clause came very close in its wording to the language of incorporation—indeed it only just missed it. It did not amount to that of course, for annexation or cession in sovereignty of the mandated territory was something which it was one of the aims of the mandates system to avoid. But this clause did create a situation that was utterly irreconcilable with unilateral revocability,—with the idea that at some future date the existing administrative and legal integrations, and applicable laws of the mandatory concerned, could be displaced by the handing over of the territory to another mandatory, to be then administered as an integral portion of its territory and subjected to another set of laws;—and of course this process could in theory be repeated indefinitely, if the revocability in principle of mandates once came to be admitted.

84. In consequence, although the mandates did not contain any provision affirmatively ruling out revocability, the "integral portion" clause in the "B" and "C" mandates had in practice much the same effect. Significantly, no such clause figured in any of the "A" mandates which were, from the start (paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Covenant), regarded as relating to territories whose "existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized". Naturally the insertion of the "integral portion" clause in the "B" and "C" mandates did not in any way preclude the eventual attainment of self-government or independence by the territories concerned, as indeed happened with most of them some forty years later,—with the consent of the mandatory concerned; but that is another matter. What it did preclude was any interim change of régime without the consent of the mandatory.

⁵⁷ In the Mandate for SW. Africa that provision read as follows:

"The Mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present Mandate as an integral portion of the Union of South Africa, and may apply the laws of the Union of South Africa to the territory, subject to such local modifications as circumstances may require."

The phrase "subject to the present Mandate" of course qualifies and describes the word "territory".

(c) Positive contra-indications:—(2) based on the circumstances prevailing when the mandates system was established

85. As is well known, the mandates system represented a compromise between, on the one hand, President Wilson's desire to place all enemy territory outside Europe or Asia Minor (and even some in Europe) under direct League of Nations administration,—and, on the other hand, the desire of some of the Allied nations (more particularly as regards the eventual "C" mandates) to obtain a cession to themselves of these territories, which their forces had overrun and occupied during the war⁵⁸. The factor of "geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory", specifically mentioned in paragraph 6 of Article 22 of the Covenant, was of course especially (indeed uniquely) applicable to the case of SW. Africa, and had unquestionably been introduced with that case in mind. The compromise just referred to was accepted only with difficulty by some of the mandatories and, in the case of the "C" mandates only after assurances that the mandates would give them ownership in all but name⁵⁹. Whether this attitude was unethical according to present-day standards (it certainly was not so then) is juridically beside the point. It clearly indicates what the intentions of the parties were, and upon what basis the "C" mandates were accepted. This does not of course mean that the mandatories obtained sovereignty. But it does mean that they could never, in the case of these territories contiguous to or very near their own⁶⁰, have been willing to accept a system according to which, at the will of the Council of the League, they might at some future date find themselves displaced in favour of another entity—possibly a hostile or unfriendly one—(as is indeed precisely the intention now). No sovereign State at that time—or indeed at any other time—would have accepted the administration of a territory on such terms. To the mandatories, their right of veto in the Council was an essential condition of their acceptance of this compromise,—and that they viewed it as extending to any question involving a possible change in the identity of the mandatory is beyond all possible doubt. Here once more is a consideration that completely negatives the idea of unilateral revocability.

⁵⁸ Such occupation, being a war-time one, was not in the nature of annexation, and its ultimate outcome had in any case to await the eventual peace settlement.

⁵⁹ See Mr. Lloyd George's statement to the Prime Minister of Australia, and the question put by Mr. Hughes of Canada, as given by Slonim in Canadian Yearbook of International Law, Vol. VI, p. 135, citing Scott, "Australia During the War" in The Official History of Australia in the War of 1914-18, XI, p. 784.

⁶⁰ On the geographical question, see the very forthright remarks made about SW. Africa by Mr. Lloyd George to President Wilson as recorded in the former's The Truth About the Peace Treaties, Vol. I, pp. 114 et seq and 190-191.

3. General conclusion

86. Taking these various factors together, as they have been stated in the preceding paragraphs, the conclusion must be that no presumptions or unexpressed implications of revocability are applicable in the present case, and that in any event they would be overwhelmingly negated by the strongest possible contra-indications.

87. Test of this conclusion—a good test of this conclusion is to enquire what happened as regards those former mandated territories that were eventually placed under the United Nations trusteeship system. Here was an opportunity for the Assembly to introduce an express power of unilateral revocation into the various trusteeship agreements entered into under Article 79 of the Charter. This however was not done, for one very simple reason, namely that not a single administering authority, in respect of any single trusteeship, would have been prepared to agree to the inclusion of such a power—any more than, as a mandatory, it had been prepared to agree to it in the time of the League. The point involved is of exactly the same order (though in a different but related context⁶¹) as that to which attention was drawn in paragraphs 93-95 of the 1966 Judgment of the Court⁶¹, where it was stated (I.C.J. Reports 1966, p. 49) that there was one test that could be applied in order to ascertain what had really been intended, namely,

“ . . . by enquiring what the States who were members of the League when the mandates system was instituted did when, as Members of the United Nations, they joined in setting up the trusteeship system that was to replace the mandates system. In effect . . . they did exactly the same as had been done before . . . ”.

And so it was over revocation. No more than before was any provision for it made. Is it really to ascribe this to a belief that it was not necessary because all international mandates and trusts were inherently subject to unilateral revocation, irrespective of the consent of the administering authority?—or would it be more reasonable to suppose that it was because no such thing was intended? If no such thing was intended in the case of the trust territories (all of them formerly mandated territories), this was because no such thing had been intended, or had ever been instituted, in the case of the mandated territories themselves, as mandates. The former mandatories were simply perpetuating in this respect the same system as before (and the Assembly tacitly agreed to this under the various trusteeship agreements). This previous system of course applied, and continues to apply, to the mandated territory of SW. Africa.

⁶¹ The 1966 Judgment of the Court found that the compulsory adjudication articles of the mandates only applied to disputes concerning clauses about the economic and other individual interests of members of the League, and not to clauses concerning the conduct of the mandates themselves, which was a matter vested collectively in the League as an entity. This view was confirmed by the fact that, in the trusteeship agreements relating to former mandated territories, a compulsory adjudication article figured only in those trusteeships which included clauses of the former kind, but not in those which were confined to the latter type of clause.

* * *

88. Since the conclusion reached is that League of Nations mandates would not have been subject to unilateral revocation by the Council of the League or—what comes to the same thing—that the concurrence of the mandatory concerned would have been required for any change of mandatory, or for the termination of the mandate on a basis of self-government or independence;—and since the United Nations cannot have any greater powers in the matter than had the League, it follows that the Assembly can have had no competence to revoke South Africa's mandate, even if it had become subrogated to the League Council's supervisory role—for that role did not comprise any power of unilateral revocation.

* * *

89. There are however other reasons, resulting from the United Nations Charter itself, why the organs of the United Nations had no competence to revoke the Mandate, whether or not they would otherwise have had it; and these will now be considered in the next main section (Section C).

SECTION C

LIMITATIONS ON THE COMPETENCE AND POWERS OF THE ORGANS OF THE UNITED NATIONS UNDER THE CHARTER

90. In the two preceding main sections it has been held, first (Section A) that the United Nations as an Organization never became invested with any supervisory function in respect of mandates not voluntarily converted into trusteeships, and never became subrogated to the sphere of competence of the former League of Nations in respect of mandates; and secondly (Section B) that since in any event that competence did not include any power of unilateral revocation of a mandate, or of terminating it without the consent of the mandatory concerned, the United Nations would equally have had no competence to exercise such a power even if it had, in principle, become subrogated to the role of the League in respect of mandates. But in addition to the limitations thus arising, both from general rules of law and from the provisions of the relevant governing instruments, there is also the question of the limitations imposed upon the competence and sphere of authority of the organs of the United Nations by the constitution of the latter, as embodied in its Charter. Since these organs (in the present context the General Assembly and the Security Council) are the creations of the Charter, they are necessarily subject to such limitations, and can prima facie, take valid action only upon that basis.

1. Competence and Powers of the General Assembly under the Charter

91. So far as the Assembly is concerned, there arises at the outset an important preliminary question, namely whether it was competent to act as (in effect) a court of law to pronounce, as judge in its own cause, on charges in respect of which it was itself the complainant. In my opinion it was not; and this suffices in itself to render Resolution 2145, by which the Assembly purported to revoke the Mandate for SW. Africa, invalid and inoperative. However, in order not to break the thread of the present argument, I deal with the matter in the first section of the Annex to this Opinion.

(i) The Assembly lacks any general competence to take action of an executive character

92. In contrast with the former League of Nations, in which both main bodies, except in certain specified cases, acted by unanimity, the basic structure adopted in the drafting of the United Nations Charter consisted in the establishment of a careful balance between a small organ—the Security Council, acting within a comparatively limited field, but able, in that field, to take binding decisions for certain purposes;—and a larger organ, the General Assembly, with a wide field of competence, but in general, only empowered to discuss and recommend;—this distinction being fundamental. The powers of the Security Council will be considered at a later stage. As to the Assembly, the list appended below in footnote 62 indicates the general character of what it was empowered to do. From ⁶² The list shows that the Assembly is either limited to making recommendations, or that where it can do more, it is as a result of a specific power conferred by the express terms of some provision of the Charter. In other words the Assembly has no inherent or residual power to do more than recommend.

(a) The recommendatory functions are described as follows:—

[The General Assembly]

Article 10: “may discuss . . . and . . . make recommendations”;

Article 11, paragraph 1: “may consider . . . and . . . make recommendations”;

what this list reveals (seen against the whole conceptual background of the Charter), there arises an irrebuttable presumption that except in the few cases (see section (d) of the list) in which executive or operative powers are specifically conferred on the Assembly, it does not, so far as the Charter is concerned, have them. In consequence, anything else it does outside those specific powers, whatever it may be and however the relevant resolution is worded, can only operate as a recommendation. It should hardly be necessary to point out the fallacy of an argument which would attribute to the Assembly a residual power to take executive action at large, because it has a specific power so to do under certain particular articles (4, 5, 6 and 17). On the contrary, the correct inference is the reverse one—that where no such power has been specifically given, it does not exist.

93. It follows ineluctably from the above, that the Assembly has no implied powers except such as are mentioned in (e) of footnote 62. All its powers, whether they be executive or only recommendatory, are precisely formulated in the Charter and there is no residuum. Naturally any organ must be deemed to have the powers necessary to enable it to perform the specific functions it is invested with. This is what the Court had in mind when, in the Injuries to United Nations Servants (Count Bernadotte) case (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 182), it said that the United Nations:

Article 11, paragraph 2: “may discuss . . . and . . . make recommendations”;
Article 11, paragraph 3: “may call . . . attention . . . to”;
Article 12, paragraph 1: “shall not make any recommendation . . . unless [so requested]”;
Article 13: “shall initiate studies and make recommendations”;
Article 14: “may recommend measures”;
Article 15: “shall receive and consider [reports]”;
Article 16: “shall perform such functions . . . as are assigned to it [by Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter]”;
Article 105, paragraph 3: “may make recommendations”.

- (b) The peace-keeping functions conferred upon the Assembly by Article 35 are, by its third paragraph, specifically stated to be “subject to the provisions of Articles 11 and 12” (as to which, see above).
- (c) As regards Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter (trusteeships), the only provisions which refer to the Assembly are:

Article 85, which (without any indication of what the functions in question are) provides that the non-strategic area functions of the United Nations “with regard to trusteeship agreements” (italics added) “including the approval of the terms of” such agreements, “shall be exercised by the . . . Assembly”.

Article 87, under which the Assembly may “consider reports” (“submitted by the administering authority”); “accept petitions and examine them” (“in consultation with [that] authority”); “provide for periodic visits” to trust “... must be deemed to have those powers which, though not expressly provided in the Charter, are conferred upon it by necessary implication as being essential to the performance of its duties”.

This is acceptable if it is read as being related and confined to existing and specified duties; but it would be quite another matter, by a process of implication, to seek to bring about an extension of functions, such as would result for the Assembly if it were deemed (outside of Articles 4, 5, 6 and 17) to have a non-specified power, not only to discuss and recommend, but to take executive action, and to bind.

94. In the same way, whereas the practice of an organization, or of a particular organ of it, can modify the manner of exercise of one of its functions (as for instance in the case of the veto in the Security Council which is not deemed to be involved by a mere abstention), such practice cannot, in principle, modify or add to the function itself. Without in any absolute sense denying that, through a sufficiently steady and long-continued course of conduct, a new tacit agreement may arise having a modificatory effect, the presumption is against it,—especially in the case of an organization whose constituent instrument provides for its own amendment, and prescribes with some particularity what the means of effecting this are to be. There is a close analogy here with the principle enunciated by the Court in the North Sea Continental Shelf case (I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 25) that when a convention has in terms provided for a territories (“at times agreed upon with the [same] authority”); and “take these and other actions in conformity with the terms of the trusteeship agreements” (italics added).

None of this invests the Assembly with any binding or executive powers except in so far as might specifically be conferred upon it by the express terms of the trusteeship agreements. These did not in fact any of them do so (see footnote 64 below).

(d) In the result, the only provisions of the Charter which confer executive or quasi-executive powers on the Assembly are:

Articles 4, 5 and 6, which enable the Assembly to admit a new Member, or suspend or expel an existing one,—in each case only upon the recommendation of the Security Council; and Article 17, under paragraph 1 of which the Assembly is to “consider and approve” the budget of the Organization, with the corollary (paragraph 2) that the expenses of the Organization are to be borne by the Members “as apportioned by the Assembly”. Under paragraph 3, the Assembly is to “consider and approve” financial arrangements with the specialized agencies, but is only to “examine” their budgets “with a view to making recommendations” to them.

(e) The Assembly naturally has those purely domestic, internal, and procedural executive powers without which such a body could not function, e.g., to elect its own officers; fix the dates and times of its meetings; determine its agenda; appoint standing committees and ad hoc ones; establish staff regulations; decide to hold a diplomatic conference under United Nations auspices, etc., etc.

particular method whereby some process is to be carried out (in that case it was the method of becoming bound by the convention), it was “not lightly to be presumed that”, although this method had not been followed, the same result had “nevertheless somehow [been achieved] in another way”—a principle which, had it been applied by the Court in the present case⁶³, would have led to a totally different outcome, as can be seen from Sections A and B above.

95. Translating this into the particular field of mandates, it is clear that, just as the Assembly would have no power to make a grant of sovereign independence to a non-self-governing territory under Articles 73 and 74 of the Charter, nor to terminate a trusteeship without the consent of the administering authority (see relevant clauses of the various trusteeship agreements made under Article 79 of the Charter⁶⁴),—so equally, given the actual language of the Charter, does the Assembly have no power to evict a mandatory. Any resolution of the Assembly purporting to do that could therefore only have the status of, and operate as, a non-binding recommendation. The power given to the Assembly by Articles 5 and 6 of the Charter to suspend or expel a member State (upon the recommendation of the Security Council) would of course enable it to suspend or expel a mandatory from its membership of the United Nations; but this cannot be extended on a sort of analogical basis to the quite different act of purporting to revoke the mandatory’s mandate.

* * *

96. From all of this, only one conclusion is possible, namely that so far as the terms of the Charter itself are concerned, the Assembly has no power to terminate any kind of administration over any kind of territory.

* * *

97. It may however be contended that the matter does not end there, for it may be possible for powers other or greater than its normal ones to be conferred upon an international organ aliunde or ab extra, for some particular purpose—e.g., under a treaty,—and if so, why should it not exercise them? This contention must now be considered.

⁶³ This affords an excellent illustration (and many more could be given) of the fact that, owing to the constant changes in the composition of the Court, due to the system of triennial elections created by its Statute, the Court does not always adhere to its own jurisprudence.

⁶⁴ The various trusteeship agreements deal differently with the question of the termination, or possible termination of the trust, but the effect is that in no case does the Assembly possess any unilateral power in the matter. If therefore no trusteeship can be terminated without the consent, given in one form or another, of the administering powers, why should it be so unthinkable that a mandate should not be terminable without the consent of the mandatory?

(ii) The Assembly can only exercise powers conferred upon it or derived aliunde or ab extra provided it keeps within the limits of its constitutional role under the structure of the Charter

98. The question here is whether it is legally possible for a body such as the Assembly, in the purported exercise of what may conveniently be called "extra-mural" powers, to act in a manner in which, in the intra-mural exercise of its normal functions, it would be precluded by its constitution from doing. To put the matter in its most graphic form, suppose for instance a group of member States of the United Nations—in a particular region perhaps—entered into a treaty under which they conferred on the Assembly, in relation to themselves and for that region, exactly those peace-keeping powers which, under the Charter, the Security Council is empowered to take as regards the member States of the United Nations collectively. Could it then validly be argued that although it would be ultra vires for the Assembly so to act under the Charter, if Charter action were involved, nevertheless it could in this particular case do so because it had acquired, aliunde, the necessary power vis-à-vis the particular States members of the regional group concerned, by reason of the treaty concluded between them investing the Assembly with such power? It is in fact approximately upon the basis of a theory such as this one, that those who (to their credit) feel some difficulty in attributing executive powers to the Assembly, outside those specified in Articles 4, 5, 6 and 17 of the Charter, rely in contending that, although under the Charter the Assembly could not do more than discuss and recommend in the field of mandates, yet it could go further than this if it had derived from the League of Nations the power to do so.

99. It should be realized that the question asked in the preceding paragraph is not merely an academic one: it is closely related to situations that have actually arisen in the history of the United Nations. There have been times when the majority of the member States have been dissatisfied with the functioning of the Security Council, whose action had become paralyzed owing to the attitude of one or more of the Permanent Members. In these circumstances recourse was had to the Assembly, which adopted resolutions containing recommendations that were not, indeed, binding but which could be, and were by most of the States concerned, regarded as authorizing them to adopt courses they might not otherwise have felt justified in following. If such situations were to arise again and continue persistently, it could be but a step from that to attempts to invest the Assembly with a measure of executive power by the process already described, or something analogous to it.

* * *

100. It so happens that the principle of the question under discussion arose in the Voting Procedure case, and was dealt with both by the Court and by three individual judges in a sense adverse to the contention now being considered. It was Sir Hersch Lauterpacht who gave the most direct general negative; and though he was speaking with reference to the question of the voting rule, the principle involved was exactly the same (I.C.J. Reports 1955, at p. 109):

“... the . . . Assembly cannot act in that way. It cannot override a seemingly mandatory provision of the Charter by the device of accepting a task conferred by a treaty. It might otherwise be possible to alter, through extraneous treaties, the character of the Organization in an important aspect of its activity”—(my italics).

The passage italicised is precisely applicable to the situation that would arise if the Assembly were deemed able to accept, ab extra, functions of an executive character going beyond its basic Charter role of consideration, discussion and recommendation. Even if it may not be outside the scope of the Charter for the Assembly to deal in some form with mandated territories not placed under trusteeship—e.g., as being, at the least, non-self-governing territories within the meaning of Article 73—it can only deal with them by way of discussion and recommendation, not executive action.

101. In the Voting Procedure case, the Court itself was of the same way of thinking as Sir Hersch. Having regard to the view expressed in its earlier (1950) Opinion to the effect that the degree of supervision in the Assembly should not exceed that of the League Council, and should as far as possible follow the latter's procedure (see paragraph 65 above), it became evident that if the Assembly applied its usual majority, or two-thirds majority, voting rule in the course of its supervision of the mandate, it would not be conforming to the procedure of the League Council, which was based on a unanimity rule, including even the vote of the mandatory. Moreover, it was clear that the latter rule (being more favourable to the mandatory by making decisions adverse to its views harder to arrive at) involved in consequence a lesser degree of supervision than the Assembly's voting rule would do. This being so, the question arose whether the Assembly, in order to remain within the limits of the powers derived by it from or through the instrument of mandate, as those powers had been exercised by the League Council, could proceed according to a voting rule which was not that provided for by the Charter—in short could depart from the Charter in this respect⁶⁵. The Court answered this question by a decided negative in the following terms (I.C.J. Reports 1955, at p. 75):

“The constitution of an organ usually prescribes the method of voting by which the organ arrives at its decisions. The voting system is related to the composition and functions of the organ. It forms one of the characteristics of the constitution of the organ. Taking decisions by a two-thirds majority vote or by a simple majority vote is one of the distinguishing features of the General Assembly, while the unanimity rule was one of the distinguishing features of the Council of the League of Nations. These two systems are characteristic of different organs, and one system cannot be substituted for another without constitutional amendment. To transplant upon the General Assembly the unanimity rule of the Council of the League . . . would amount to a disregard of one of the characteristics of the . . . Assembly.”

This view was independently concurred in by Judges Basdevant, Klaestad and Lauterpacht. Judge Basdevant said (at p. 82):

“The majority rule laid down by Article 18 of the Charter and the unanimity rule prescribed by the Covenant of the League of Nations are something other than rules of procedure: they determine an essential characteristic of the organs in question and of their parent international institutions.” (For Judge Klaestad’s view see paragraph 104 below and paragraph (a) of footnote 66.)

102. The criteria thus enunciated by the Court and by Judge Basdevant were, be it noted, formulated precisely in the context of the mandates system. It is therefore legitimate to apply them to the present case; and if this is done in terms of the last two sentences of the foregoing quotation from the 1955 Opinion of the Court, the result is that there “cannot . . . without constitutional amendment” “be substituted” for a system which only allows the Assembly to discuss and recommend, “another” system which would allow it, in addition, to take executive and peremptory action,—and that, to deem the Assembly to be invested with such a power “would amount to a disregard of one of [its] characteristics” within the system of the Charter.

* * *

⁶⁵ The form in which the question arose in the Voting Procedure case was a little different, inasmuch as the issue was not whether the Assembly could act in a way not provided for by the Charter, but whether it could do so if this would involve a more stringent supervisory régime than that of the League’s system. But the underlying point was the same—i.e., could the Assembly, in the exercise of ab extra functions, act by means of a different voting rule from that provided by the Charter—could it in any event, consistently with the Charter, apply the League unanimity rule?

103. It must be concluded that even if the League Council's supervisory powers had in principle passed to the Assembly, and had included the right to revoke an existing mandate, such a right could not, constitutionally, be exercised by the Assembly, since this would be inconsistent with the basic philosophy of its role within the general structure of the United Nations.

(iii) Elements confirming the above conclusions

104. Dilemma of Judges Klaestad and Lauterpacht in the Voting Procedure case—The problem in the Voting Procedure case was that, as has already been mentioned, the fact that decisions could be more easily arrived at under the Assembly's voting rule than under the League's rule of unanimity including the vote of the mandatory, involved for the latter a "greater degree of supervision" than the League's. Yet, as the Court found (see ante, paragraph 101), the Assembly could not, conformably with the Charter, depart from its own voting rule. The Court solved this problem by holding that although, in the exercise of its supervisory function, the Assembly must not depart from the substance of the mandate, the procedure by which it carried out that function must be the procedure provided for by the Charter; and that the Court's previous (1950) pronouncement, indicating that the degree of supervision must not be greater than the League's, was intended to apply only to matters of substance, not procedure. Given that the Assembly's voting rule did however, in principle, involve a greater degree of supervision than the League rule, by making it possible for decisions to be arrived at without the concurrence of the mandatory, this pronouncement of the Court in the Voting Procedure case involved a distinct element of inconsistency. That solution accordingly did not satisfy Judges Klaestad and Lauterpacht who arrived at a different and more logical one, avoiding contradictions and, at the same time, operating to confirm in a very striking manner the views expressed above as to the limits imposed by the Charter on the powers of the Assembly. They pointed out that the decisions reached by that organ in the course of supervising the mandate, not being in the nature of domestic, internal or procedural decisions (see head (e) in note 62 above) could only operate as recommendations, and could not therefore in any case be binding on the mandatory unless it had at least voted in favour of them⁶⁶. Hence the Assembly's two-thirds rule, though theoretically more burdensome for the mandatory than the League's rule of unanimity including the mandatory's vote, would not in practice be so, since in neither case could the mandatory be bound without its own concurrence. In this way the balance between the weight of the League Council's supervision and that of the Assembly would be maintained or restored.

⁶⁶ (a) Distinguishing between the "domestic" or "internal", and the non-domestic categories of Assembly decisions, Judge Klaestad (I.C.J. Reports 1955, at p. 88) stated that in his opinion "recommendations . . . concerning reports and petitions relating to . . . South West Africa belong . . . to the last mentioned category". He continued:

"They are not legally binding on the Union . . . in its capacity as Mandatory Power. Only if the Union Government by a concurrent vote has given its consent to the recommendation can that Government become legally bound to comply with it. In that respect the legal situation is the same as it was under the supervision of the League. Only a concurrent vote can create a binding legal obligation for the Union of South Africa"—(my italics).

(b) Judge Lauterpacht illustrated his view by reference to the trusteeship position, which he regarded as relevant to that of mandates. The passage in question is so striking as to be worth quoting in extenso,—and it is of course applicable a fortiori to the case of mandates (loc. cit., at p. 116):

"This, in principle, is also the position with respect to the recommendations of the General Assembly in relation to the administration of trust territories. The Trusteeship Agreements do not provide for a legal obligation of the Administering Authority to comply with the decisions of the organs of the United Nations in the matter of trusteeship. Thus there is no legal obligation, on the part of the Administering Authority to give effect to a recommendation of the General Assembly to adopt or depart from a particular course of legislation or any particular administrative measure. The legal obligation resting upon the Administering Authority is to administer the Trust Territory in accordance with the principles of the Charter and the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement, but not necessarily in accordance with any specific recommendation of the General Assembly or of the Trusteeship Council. This is so as a matter both of existing law and of sound principles of government. The Administering Authority, not the General Assembly, bears the direct responsibility for the welfare of the population of the Trust Territory. There is no sufficient guarantee of the timeliness and practicability of a particular recommendation made by a body acting occasionally amidst a pressure of business, at times deprived of expert advice and information, and not always able to foresee the consequences of a particular measure in relation to the totality of legislation and administration of the trust territory. Recommendations in the sphere of trusteeship have been made by the General Assembly frequently and as a matter of course. To suggest that any such particular recommendation is binding in the sense that there is a legal obligation to put it into effect is to run counter not only to the paramount rule that the General Assembly has no legal power to legislate or bind its Members by way of recommendations, but, for reasons stated, also to cogent considerations of good government and administration"—(my italics).

"In fact States administering Trust Territories have often asserted their right not to accept recommendations of the General Assembly or of the Trusteeship Council as approved by the General Assembly. That right has never been seriously challenged. There are numerous examples of express refusal on the part of the Administering Authority to comply with a recommendation." [Follow-

105. This conclusion could not be other than correct;—for if the Assembly’s decisions bound the mandatory without the latter’s consent, whereas the League’s did not, there would be imposed a degree of supervision not only far heavier, but differing totally in kind from that of the League. To put the matter in another way, if the substitution of the Assembly for the League Council could not be allowed to operate so as to increase the Mandatory’s obligations, it correspondingly could not be allowed to operate to increase the supervisory organ’s powers, still less to give it a power that the former supervisory organ never had, or could never have exercised except in a certain way and by a certain kind of vote. It follows that such a power could not be exercised by the Assembly either, especially since the latter equally cannot bind the mandatory and cannot go beyond recommendations without exceeding its constitutional Charter powers. In consequence, Resolution 2145, even if it were otherwise valid, could not have any higher status or effect than, or operate except as, a recommendation that South Africa’s administration should terminate, and not as an actual termination of it. I have to point out in conclusion that the whole of this most important aspect of the matter, resulting from the Court’s own jurisprudence as it was enunciated in the 1955 Voting Procedure case, is now completely ignored, and not even mentioned, in the present Opinion of the Court;—for the sufficient reason no doubt that there is no satisfactory answer that can be given to it.

106. The answer given by the Court in 1950 to the question lettered (c) put to it in the then advisory proceedings—This question asked where the competence to modify the international status of SW. Africa lay, upon the assumption that it did not lie with South Africa acting unilaterally. The Court replied (I.C.J. Reports 1950, at p. 144):

“... that the Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and

ing upon this (loc. cit., pp. 116-117) Judge Lauterpacht cited, with references, a long list of specific instances.]

(c) With regard to mandates equally, in a passage of quite particular significance in the circumstances of the present case, Sir Hersch Lauterpacht said (loc. cit., at p. 121):

“This absence of a purely legal machinery and the reliance upon the moral authority of the findings and the reports of the Mandates Commission are in fact the essential feature of the supervision of the Mandates system. Public opinion—and the resulting attitude of the Mandatory Powers—were influenced not so much by the formal resolutions of the Council and Assembly [of the League] as by the reports of the Mandates Commission which was the true organ of supervision . . . yet no legal sanction was attached to non-compliance with or disregard of the recommendations, the hopes and the regrets of the Commission”—(my italics).

modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations”—(my italics).

It is clear that even if the Mandate itself persisted under another authority the change of authority (particularly if the new one was the United Nations as such) would unquestionably involve a modification of the international status of the territory, not only by substituting a new administration for the existing one, but by substituting one which could not itself be subjected to any supervision at all, except its own, and which would have to render reports to itself (and so—quis custodiet ipsos custodes?)⁶⁷. It therefore follows from what the Court said about modifying the status of the territory, that the competence to effect any substitution of this kind (or any other change of mandatory) would rest “with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations”,—which view invests South Africa with the initiative, and negatives the existence of any independent right of termination resident in the United Nations acting alone. Even allowing for the fact that the issue at that time was whether the mandatory had any unilateral power of modification it is impossible to reconcile the phraseology employed with the idea that the Court in 1950 could have thought the United Nations, or any organ of it, acting alone, had such a power. As my colleague Judge Gros points out, both aspects of the matter had been raised in the course of the proceedings.

(iv) Conclusion as to the powers of the Assembly

107. The foregoing considerations lead to the conclusion that even if the Assembly inherited a supervisory role from the League Council, it could exercise it only within the limits of its competence under the Charter namely by way of discussion and recommendation. Such a situation has no room for, and is entirely incompatible with any power to revoke a mandate. In consequence, Assembly Resolution 2145 could have effect only as a recommendation.

⁶⁷ Even if the Assembly had “inherited” the supervisory function from the League, this function manifestly cannot include administration,—for the essence of supervision is its exercise by a separate body, not being the administering authority. The idea of mandates administered direct by the League itself without a mandatory as intermediary, which formed part of President Wilson’s original proposals at Versailles, was not adopted, and formed no part of the League mandates system which it is claimed that the United Nations inherited.

modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations”—(my italics).

It is clear that even if the Mandate itself persisted under another authority the change of authority (particularly if the new one was the United Nations as such) would unquestionably involve a modification of the international status of the territory, not only by substituting a new administration for the existing one, but by substituting one which could not itself be subjected to any supervision at all, except its own, and which would have to render reports to itself (and so—quis custodiet ipsos custodes?)⁶⁷. It therefore follows from what the Court said about modifying the status of the territory, that the competence to effect any substitution of this kind (or any other change of mandatory) would rest “with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations”,—which view invests South Africa with the initiative, and negatives the existence of any independent right of termination resident in the United Nations acting alone. Even allowing for the fact that the issue at that time was whether the mandatory had any unilateral power of modification it is impossible to reconcile the phraseology employed with the idea that the Court in 1950 could have thought the United Nations, or any organ of it, acting alone, had such a power. As my colleague Judge Gros points out, both aspects of the matter had been raised in the course of the proceedings.

(iv) Conclusion as to the powers of the Assembly

107. The foregoing considerations lead to the conclusion that even if the Assembly inherited a supervisory role from the League Council, it could exercise it only within the limits of its competence under the Charter namely by way of discussion and recommendation. Such a situation has no room for, and is entirely incompatible with any power to revoke a mandate. In consequence, Assembly Resolution 2145 could have effect only as a recommendation.

⁶⁷ Even if the Assembly had “inherited” the supervisory function from the League, this function manifestly cannot include administration,—for the essence of supervision is its exercise by a separate body, not being the administering authority. The idea of mandates administered direct by the League itself without a mandatory as intermediary, which formed part of President Wilson’s original proposals at Versailles, was not adopted, and formed no part of the League mandates system which it is claimed that the United Nations inherited.

2. Competence and powers of the Security Council relative to mandates

(i) Consequential character of the Security Council's resolutions in the present case

108. It is strictly superfluous to consider what (if any) were the Security Council's powers in relation to mandates, because it is quite clear that the Council never took any independent action to terminate South Africa's mandate. All its resolutions were consequential, proceeding on the basis of a supposed termination already effected or declared by the Assembly. Without the Assembly's act, the acts of the Security Council, which were largely in the nature of a sort of attempted enforcement of what the Assembly had declared, would have lacked all raison d'être;—while on the other hand, if the Assembly's resolution 2145 lacked in se validity and legal effect, no amount of "confirmation" by the Security Council could validate it or lend it such effect, or independently bring about the revocation of a mandate.

(ii) On a mandates basis, the powers of the Security Council are no greater than the Assembly's

109. The words "relative to mandates" have been inserted of set purpose in the title to this subsection,—because it is necessary to distinguish clearly between what the Security Council can do on a mandates basis and what it might be able to do on the only other possible basis on which it could act, namely a peace-keeping basis. On a mandates basis the Security Council has no greater powers than the Assembly,—for (see the 1950 Opinion of the Court at p. 137)⁶⁸ it was the United Nations as a whole which inherited—or did not inherit—the role of the League of Nations in respect of mandates, together with (if it did) such powers as were comprised in that role. Consequently, as regards any power of revocation, the Security Council stands on exactly the same footing as the Assembly in respect of such questions as whether the United Nations has any supervisory function at all and, if so, whether it includes any power of revocation;—subject however to this one qualification, namely that in 1950 the Court very definitely (loc. cit.) indicated the Assembly as the appropriate organ to exercise the supervisory function it found the United Nations to be invested with. It must therefore be questioned whether the Security Council has any specific role whatever in respect of mandates as such, similar to that which it has in respect of strategic trusteeships. If this is so, it would be solely for peace-keeping purposes that the Security Council would be competent to take action in respect of a mandate.

⁶⁸ Speaking of the final League winding-up resolution of 18 April 1946 (see paragraphs 41 and 42 above) the Court said "This resolution pre-supposes that the supervisory functions exercised by the League would be taken over by the United Nations"—(my italics).

(iii) Wider powers in the field of mandates exercisable only on a peace-keeping basis

110. As regards the alternative basis of Security Council intervention, clearly that organ cannot be precluded from exercising its normal peace-keeping functions merely because the threat to the peace, if there is one, has arisen in a mandates context,—provided the intervention has a genuinely peace-keeping aim and is not a disguised exercise in mandates supervision. What the Security Council cannot properly do is, in the guise of peace-keeping, to exercise functions in respect of mandates, where those functions do not properly belong to it either as a self-contained organ or as part of the United Nations as a whole. It cannot, in the guise of peace-keeping revoke a mandate any more than it can, in the guise of peace-keeping order transfers or cessions of territory.

111. However, in my opinion, the various Security Council resolutions involved did not, on their language, purport to be in the exercise of the peace-keeping function. There is in fact something like a careful avoidance of phraseology that would be too unambiguous in this respect. That being so, their effect was as indicated in paragraphs 108-109 above. They were not binding on the Mandatory or on other member States of the United Nations. Like those of the Assembly they could only have a recommendatory effect in the present context.

(iv) Proper scope of the Security Council's peace-keeping powers under the Charter

112. This matter, so far as the actual terms of the Charter are concerned is governed by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 24 which read as follows:

“1. In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf.

2. In discharging these duties the Security Council shall act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of these duties are laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII”—(my italics).

I am unable to agree with the extremely wide interpretation which the Opinion of the Court places on this provision. No doubt it does not limit the occasions on which the Security Council can act in the preservation of peace and security, provided the threat said to be involved is not a mere figment or pretext. What it does do is to limit the type of action the Council can take in the discharge of its peace-keeping responsibilities,—for the second paragraph of Article 24 states in terms that the specific powers granted to the Security Council for these purposes are laid down in the indicated Chapters (VI, VII, VIII and XII). According to normal canons of interpretation this means that so far as peace-keeping is concerned, they are not to be found anywhere else, and are exercisable only as those Chapters allow. It is therefore to them that recourse must be had in order to ascertain what the specific peace-keeping powers of the Security Council are, including the power to bind. If this is done, it will be found that only when the Council is acting under Chapter VII, or possibly in certain cases under Chapter VIII, will its resolutions be binding on member States. In other cases their effect would be recommendatory or hortatory only. (Peace-keeping action under Chapter XII—strategic trusteeships—does not really seem to me to be a separate case, since it is difficult to see how it could fail to take the form of action under Chapters VI or VII as the case might be.)

113. These limitations apply equally to the effect of Article 25 of the Charter, by reason of the proviso “in accordance with the present Charter”. If, under the relevant chapter or article of the Charter, the decision is not binding, Article 25 cannot make it so. If the effect of that Article were automatically to make all decisions of the Security Council binding, then the words “in accordance with the present Charter” would be quite superfluous. They would add nothing to the preceding and only other phrase in the Article, namely “The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council”, which they are clearly intended to qualify. They effectively do so only if the decisions referred to are those which are duly binding “in accordance with the present Charter”. Otherwise the language used in such parts of the Charter as Chapter VI for instance, indicative of recommendatory functions only, would be in direct contradiction with Article 25—or Article 25 with them.

114. Since, in consequence, the question whether any given resolution of the Security Council is binding or merely recommendatory in effect, must be a matter for objective determination in each individual case, it follows that the Council cannot, merely by invoking Article 25 (as it does for instance in its Resolution 269 of 12 August 1969) impart obligatory character to a resolution which would not otherwise possess it according to the terms of the chapter or article of the Charter on the basis of which the Council is, or must be deemed to be, acting.

(v) The Security Council is not competent, even for genuine peace-keeping purposes, to effect definitive changes in territorial sovereignty or administrative rights

115. There is more. Even when acting under Chapter VII of the Charter itself, the Security Council has no power to abrogate or alter territorial rights, whether of sovereignty or administration. Even a war-time occupation of a country or territory cannot operate to do that. It must await the peace settlement. This is a principle of international law that is as well-established as any there can be,—and the Security Council is as much subject to it (for the United Nations is itself a subject of international law) as any of its individual member States are. The Security Council might, after making the necessary determinations under Article 39 of the Charter, order the occupation of a country or piece of territory in order to restore peace and security, but it could not thereby, or as part of that operation, abrogate or alter territorial rights;—and the right to administer a mandated territory is a territorial right without which the territory could not be governed or the mandate be operated. It was to keep the peace, not to change the world order, that the Security Council was set up.

* * *

116. These limitations on the powers of the Security Council are necessary because of the all too great ease with which any acutely controversial international situation can be represented as involving a latent threat to peace and security, even where it is really too remote genuinely to constitute one. Without these limitations, the functions of the Security Council could be used for purposes never originally intended,—and the present case is a very good illustration of this: for not only was the Security Council not acting under Chapter VII of the Charter (which it obviously could not do—though it remains to be seen by what means and upon what grounds the necessary threat to, or breach of the peace, or act of aggression will be determined to exist);—not only was there no threat to peace and security other than such as might be artificially created as a pretext for the realization of ulterior purposes,—but the whole operation, which will not necessarily end there, had as its object the abrogation of the Mandatory's rights of territorial administration, in order to secure (not eventually but very soon) the transformation of the mandated territory into, and its emergence as, the sovereign independent State of "Namibia". This is what is declared in terms, not only in Resolution 2145 itself, but also in the subsequent Assembly Resolution 2248 (S-V) of 1967, specifying June 1968 as the intended date of transfer⁶⁹,—and this is par excellence the type of purpose, in promoting which, the Security Council (and a fortiori the Assembly) exceeds its competence, and so acts ultra vires.

SECTION D

THE LEGAL CONSEQUENCES FOR STATES

1. In general

117. On the basis of the foregoing conclusions, the answer to the question put to the Court in the present proceedings, as to what are the legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in the mandated territory of SW. Africa, despite Security Council resolution 276 of 1970 is, strictly, that there are no specific legal consequences for States, for there has been no change in the legal position. Since neither the Security Council nor the Assembly has any competence to revoke South Africa's Mandate, the various resolutions of these organs purporting to do so, or to declare it to be at an end, or to confirm its termination, are one and all devoid of legal effect. The result is that the Mandate still subsists, and that South Africa is still the Mandatory. However, from this last conclusion there do follow certain legal consequences both for South Africa and for other States.

2. Consequences for South Africa

118. For South Africa there is an obligation

- (1) to recognize that the Mandate survived the dissolution of the League, —that it has an international character,—and that in consequence SW. Africa cannot unilaterally be incorporated in the territory of the Republic;
- (2) to perform and execute in full all the obligations of the Mandate, whatever these may be.

119. With regard to this last requirement, I have given my reasons for thinking that, the United Nations not being the successor in law to the League of Nations, the Mandatory is not, and never became subject to any duty to report to it, or accept its supervision, particularly as regards the Assembly. But as was pointed out earlier in this Opinion (paragraphs 17 and 20), it does not follow that the reporting obligation has lapsed entirely; and it is the fact that it could be carried out by the alternative means indicated in paragraph 16. This being so, the question arises whether the Mandatory has a legal duty to take some such steps as were there indicated. The matter is not free from doubt. The Court in 1950 considered the reporting obligation to be an essential part of the Mandate. Judge Read on the other hand thought that although its absence might "weaken" the Mandate, the latter would not otherwise be affected. Again if the Mandate is viewed as a treaty or contract, the normal effect of the extinction of one of the parties would be to bring the treaty or contract to an end entirely.

⁶⁹ See further in the Annex, paragraph 15 in section 3.

120. However, the better view seems to be that the reporting obligation survived, though becoming dormant upon the dissolution of the League, and certainly not transformed into an obligation relative to the United Nations. Nevertheless, if not an absolutely essential element, it is a sufficiently important part of the Mandate to place the Mandatory under an obligation to revive and carry it out, if it is at all possible to do so, by some other means⁷⁰. But the Mandatory would have the right to insist (a) on the new supervisory body being acceptable to it in character and composition—(such acceptance not to be unreasonably withheld),—(b) on the nature and implications (as to degree of supervision) of the reporting obligation being as they are indicated to be in paragraphs 76-78 above,—and (c) that, just as with the League Council, the Mandatory would be under no legal obligation to carry out the recommendations of the supervisory body, no more than States administering trust territories are obliged to accept the views of the United Nations Assembly as supervisory organ—(see supra, paragraphs 77 and 104 and footnote 66)

121. A further, or rather alternative, course that could be considered incumbent on South Africa, though as a consequence of the Charter not the Mandate, would be to resume the rendering of reports under Article 73 (e) of the Charter (see as to this the joint dissenting Opinion of 1962, I.C.J. Reports 1962, pp. 541-548 and paragraph 43 (b) above), seeing that on any view SW. Africa is a non-self-governing territory. This resumption must however be on the understanding that the reports are not dealt with by the Trusteeship Council unless South Africa so agrees.

⁷⁰ Ex hypothesi however, it would not be to the United Nations that the Mandatory would be responsible for doing this, or there would merely be the same situation in another form.

3. For other States

122. For other States the “legal consequences” of the fact that South Africa’s Mandate has not been validly revoked, and still subsists in law are:

- (1) to recognize that the United Nations is not, any more than the Mandatory, competent unilaterally to change the status of the mandated territory;
- (2) to respect and abide by the Mandatory’s continued right to administer the territory, unless and until any change is brought about by lawful means.

* * *

123. On the foregoing basis it becomes unnecessary for me to consider what the legal consequences for States would be if the view taken in the Opinion of the Court were correct; although, since the measures indicated by the Court seem to be based mostly on resolutions of the Security Council that—for the reasons given in paragraphs 112-114 above—I would regard as having only a recommendatory effect, I would be obliged to question the claim of these measures to be in the proper nature of “legal consequences”, even if I otherwise agreed with that Opinion. (I also share the views of my colleagues Judges Gros, Petrán, Onyeama and Dillard as to the standing of certain of these measures.)

124. There is however another aspect of the matter to which I attach importance and which I think needs stressing. It was for this reason, that, on 9 March 1971, during the oral proceedings (see Record, C.R. 71/19, p. 23), I put a question to Counsel for the United States of America, then addressing the Court. I do not think I can do better than cite this question and the written answer to it, as received in the Registry of the Court some ten days later (18 March 1971):

Question: In the opinion of the United States Government is there any rule of customary international law which, in general, obliges States to apply sanctions against a State which has acted, or is acting, illegally—such as cutting off diplomatic, consular and commercial relations with the tortfeasor State? If not, in what manner would States become compelled so to act—not merely by way of moral duty or in the exercise of a faculty, but as a matter of positive legal obligations?

Reply: It is the opinion of the United States that there is no rule of customary international law imposing on a State a duty to apply sanctions against the State which has acted, or is acting, illegally. However, under the Charter of the United Nations, the Security Council has the power to decide that member States should apply sanctions against the State which acts in certain illegal ways. Thus, should the Security Council determine that an illegal act by a State constitutes "a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression", it would have a duty under Article 39 to "make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security". Whenever the Security Council makes such a determination and decides that diplomatic, consular and commercial relations shall be cut off in accordance with Article 41 of the Charter, all Members of the United Nations have the duty to apply such measures.

If the latter part of this reply is intended to indicate that it is broadly speaking only in consequence of decisions taken under Chapter VII of the Charter, after a prior determination of the existence of a "threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression", that a legal duty for member States would arise to take specific measures, I can only agree.

POSTSCRIPTUM

OTHER CONSEQUENCES

125. In the latter part of his separate declaration, the President of the Court has made certain observations which, though closely related to the legal issues involved in this case, have a different character. Taking my cue from him, I should like to do the same. In the period 1945/1946, South Africa could have confronted the United Nations with a fait accompli by incorporating SW. Africa in its own territory, as a component province on a par with Cape province, Natal, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. Had this been done, there would have been no way in which it could have been prevented, or subsequently undone, short of war. Wisely however, though at the same time exercising considerable restraint from its own point of view, South Africa refrained from doing this. If however "incorporation" is something which the United Nations believes it could never accept, there should equally be a reciprocal and corresponding realization of the fact that the conversion of SW. Africa into the sovereign independent State of Namibia (unless it were on a very different basis from anything now apparently contemplated) could only be brought about by means the consequences of which would be incalculable, and which do not need to be specified. Clearly therefore, in a situation in which no useful purpose can be served by launching the irresistible force against the immovable object, statesmanship should seek a modus vivendi—while there is yet time.

(Signed) G. G. FITZMAURICE.

ANNEX

PRELIMINARY AND INCIDENTAL MATTERS ¹*1. Incompetence of the United Nations Assembly to act as a court of law*

1. When, by its Resolution 2145 of 1966, the Assembly purported to declare the termination of South Africa's mandate, on the basis of alleged fundamental breaches of it, and to declare this not merely as a matter of opinion but as an executive act having the intended operational effect of bringing the Mandate to an end—or registering its termination—and of rendering any further administration of the mandated territory by South Africa illegal,—it was making pronouncements of an essentially juridical character which the Assembly, not being a judicial organ, and not having previously referred the matter to any such organ, was not competent to make.

2. There is nothing unusual in the view here expressed. On the contrary it represents the normal state of affairs, which is that the organ competent to perform an act, in the executive sense, is not the organ competent to decide whether the conditions justifying its performance are present. In all other fields a separation of functions is the rule. Thus the legislature is alone competent to enact a law,—the executive or administration alone competent to apply or enforce it,—the judiciary alone competent to interpret it and decide whether its application or enforcement is justified in the particular case. In the institutional field, the justification for the act of some organ or body may turn upon considerations of a political or technical character, or of professional conduct or discipline, and if so, the political, technical or professional organ or body concerned will, in principle, be competent to make the necessary determinations. But where the matter turns, and turns exclusively, on considerations of a legal character, a political organ, even if it is competent to take any resulting action, is not itself competent to make the necessary legal determinations on which the justification for such action must rest. This can only be done by a legal organ competent to make such determinations.

¹ Relegation to this Annex does not in any way involve that the matters dealt with in it are regarded as of secondary importance;—quite the reverse—they involve issues as salient in their way as any in the case. But to have dealt with them at the earlier stage to which they really belong would have held up or interrupted the development of the main argument which I wished to put first.

3. It must be added that besides being ultra vires under this head, the Assembly's action was arbitrary and high-handed, inasmuch as it acted as judge in its own cause relative to charges in respect of which it was itself the complainant, and without affording to the "defendant" any of the facilities or safeguards that are a normal part of the judicial process.

4. It has been contended that the competence of the Assembly to make determinations of a legal character is shown by the fact that Article 6 of the Charter confers upon it the right (upon the recommendation of the Security Council) to expel a member State "which has persistently violated the principles contained in . . . the Charter". This however merely means that the framers of the Charter did confer this particular specific power on the Assembly, in express terms, without indicating whether or not it was one that should only be exercised after a prior determination of the alleged violations by a competent juridical organ. To argue from the power thus specifically conferred by Article 6, that the Assembly must therefore be deemed to possess a general power under the Charter to make legal determinations, is clearly fallacious.

5. The contention that Resolution 2145 did not actually terminate South Africa's mandate, but merely registered its termination by South Africa itself, through its breaches of it, i.e., that the Resolution was merely declaratory not executive, is clearly nothing but an expedient directed to avoiding the difficulty;—for even as only declaratory, the resolution amounted to a finding that there had been breaches of the Mandate,—otherwise there would have been no basis even for a declaratory resolution. It is moreover a strange and novel juridical doctrine that, by infringing an obligation, the latter can be brought to an end,—but doubtless a welcome one to those who are looking for an easy way out of an inconvenient undertaking.

6. No less of an expedient is the plea that South Africa had itself "disavowed the Mandate" ever since 1946. South Africa's attitude has always been that, as a matter of law, either the Mandate was so bound up with the League of Nations that it could not survive the latter's dissolution, or else, that if it did, it did not survive in the form claimed in the United Nations. Whether this view was correct or not it was in no sense equivalent to a "disavowal" of the Mandate. To deny the existence of an obligation is ex hypothesi not the same as to repudiate it². Nor can any such deduction legitimately be drawn from the failure to render reports to, and accept the supervision of the Assembly, based as this was on the contention (considered correct by an important body of professional opinion) that no legal obligation to that effect existed. If this were not so, no party to a dispute could argue its case without being told that, by doing so, it had “disavowed” its obligations.

² For this reason the justification for the revocation of the Mandate which the Court finds in Article 60, paragraph 3 (a), of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is quite misplaced.

* * *

7. It has also been argued that the Assembly had “vainly” tried to obtain the necessary findings from the Court via the contentious proceedings brought by Ethiopia and Liberia in the period 1960-1966. But this would be tantamount (a) to saying that because the Assembly did not get the judgment it wanted in 1966, it was therefore justified in taking the law into its own hands, which, however, would in no way serve to validate Resolution 2145;—(b) to admitting that the 1966 Judgment was right in seeing the then Applicants in the light of agents of the United Nations and not, as they represented themselves to be, litigants in contentious proceedings sustaining an interest of their own;—and (c) recognizing that, as was strongly hinted in paragraphs 46-48 (especially the latter) of the 1966 Judgment, the correct course would have been for the Assembly as an organ to have asked the Court for an advisory opinion on the question of breaches of the Mandate, in relation to which the objection as to legal interest would not have been relevant. It was still open to the Court to do this, for instance in 1967. It cannot therefore do other than give a wrong impression if it is said that the Assembly in 1966 had no other course open to it but to adopt Resolution 2145 without having previously sought legal advice on this basis.

* * *

8. These various purported justifications for the Assembly making legal determinations, though not itself a competent legal organ, and without any reference to such an organ, or even to an ad hoc body of jurists (such as was the settled practice of the League Council in all important cases), are clearly illusory. In the result, the conclusion must be that the Assembly’s act was ultra vires and hence that Resolution 2145 was invalid, even if it had not been otherwise ineffective in law to terminate South Africa’s mandate.

2. The Court’s right to examine the assumptions underlying any Request for an Advisory Opinion

9. Although the Court has to some extent gone into the question of the validity and effect of Assembly Resolution 2145, it has not adequately examined the question of its right to do so having regard to the way in which the Request for an Advisory Opinion in the present case was worded. The matter is however so important for the whole status and judicial function of the Court that it becomes necessary to consider it.

10. The Court could not properly have based itself on the literal wording of the Request, in order to regard its task in the present proceedings as being confined solely to indicating what, on the assumptions contained in the Request, and without any prior examination of their validity, are the legal consequences for States of South Africa's continued presence in SW. Africa,—those assumptions being that the Mandate for that territory had been lawfully terminated and hence that this presence was illegal³. The Court cannot do so for the simple but sufficient reason that the question whether the Mandate is or is not legally at an end goes to the root of the whole situation that has led to the Request being made. If the Mandate is still, as a matter of law, in existence, then the question put to the Court simply does not arise and no answer could be given. Alternatively the question would be a purely hypothetical one, an answer to which would, in those circumstances, serve no purpose, so that the situation would, on a different level, resemble that which, in the Northern Cameroons case (I.C.J. Reports 1963, p. 15), caused the Court to hold (at p. 38) that it could not “adjudicate upon the merits of the claim” because inter alia, the circumstances were such as would “render any adjudication devoid of purpose”. It has constantly been emphasized in past advisory cases—(and this was also confirmed in the contentious case just mentioned, in which occasion arose to consider the advisory practice)—that in advisory, no less than in contentious proceedings, the Court must still act as a court of law (and not, for instance, as a mere body of legal advisers),—that “the Court's authority to give advisory opinions must be exercised as a judicial function” (ibid., at p. 30),—and that, to use the wording of one of the most quoted dicta of the Permanent Court in the Eastern Carelia case, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 5 (1923) at page 29, the Court “being a Court of Justice, [it] cannot, even in giving advisory opinions, depart from the essential rules guiding [its] activity as a Court”.

11. So much is this the case that the original tendency in the past was to question whether the mere giving of advice, even in solemn form such as by means of an advisory opinion of the Court, was compatible with the judicial function at all⁴. The Court has not of course taken this view but,

³ The fact that certain representatives of member States in the Security Council said that they understood the Request in this sense, and even that they only agreed to it on that basis, cannot of course in any way bind the Court. Neither representatives of States, nor such organs as the Security Council itself, possess any competence to restrict the Court as to what it shall take account of in delivering a legal opinion.

⁴ See the discussion in Manley O. Hudson, The Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920-1942, pp. 510-511.

to cite a very high authority and former judge of the Permanent Court ⁵:

“... the Court ... has conceived of its advisory jurisdiction as a judicial function, and in its exercise of this jurisdiction it has kept within the limits which characterize judicial action. It has acted not as an ‘academy of jurists’ but as a responsible ‘magistrature’”—(my italics).

The words italicized in the passage just quoted contain the key to the question. If an organ such as the General Assembly or Security Council of the United Nations likes to refer some question to a body of legal experts, whether a standing one or set up ad hoc for the purpose, which that body is instructed to answer on the basis of certain specified assumptions that are to be taken as read, it will be acting perfectly properly if it proceeds accordingly, because it is not a court of law and is not discharging or attempting to discharge any judicial function: it is indeed bound by its instructions, which the organ concerned is entitled to give it. But the Court, which is itself one of the six original main organs of the United Nations, and not inferior in status to the others, is not bound to take instruction from any of them, in particular as to how it is to view and interpret its tasks as a court of law, which it is and must always remain, whatever the nature and context of the task concerned;—and whereas a body of experts may well, as a sort of technical exercise, give answers on the basis of certain underlying assumptions irrespective of their validity or otherwise, a court cannot act in this way: it is bound to look carefully at what it is being asked to do, and to consider whether the doing of it would be compatible with its status and function as a court.

12. This faculty constitutes in truth the foundation of the admitted right of the Court, deriving from the language of Article 65, paragraph 1, of its Statute, and consecrated in its jurisprudence, to refuse entirely to comply with a request for an advisory opinion if it thinks that, for sufficient reasons, it would be improper or inadvisable for it to do so;—and if the Court can thus refuse entirely, a fortiori can it, and must it, insist on undertaking a preliminary examination of the assumptions on which any request is based, particularly where, as in the present case, those assumptions are of such a character that, unless they are well-founded, the question asked has no meaning or could admit of only one reply. Otherwise put, for a court to give answers that can only have significance and relevance if a certain legal situation is presumed to exist, but without enquiring whether it does (in law) exist, amounts to no more than indulging in an interesting parlour game, which is not what courts of law are for. In the present case, if the Court had lent itself to such a course, it would not have been engaging in a judicial activity,—it would have to abnegate its true function as a court-of-law and would indeed have acted as if, in the words used by Judge Hudson, it were “an academy of jurists”.

⁵ Hudson, op. cit., p. 511.

3. Should the Court have complied with the Request in this case

13. There can be no doubt that the question put to the Court was a legal one, such as it had the power to answer if it considered it proper to do so,—more especially if (as it must be) the question is regarded as relating not only to the legal consequences of the General Assembly Resolution 2145 but also to the validity of that Resolution itself, and its effect upon the Mandate for South West Africa.

14. On the other hand, had the Court considered that the form of the question addressed to it precluded it from following any but the first course (i.e., dealing with the “consequences” alone), and excluded, or was intended to exclude, any consideration by it of the validity and effect of the act from which those consequences are supposed to flow—i.e., Assembly Resolution 2145—then this would have been a ground for declining to comply with the Request since, for the reasons given in the preceding section of this Annex, it is unacceptable for any organ making such a request to seek to limit the factors which the Court, as a court of law, considers it necessary to take into account in complying with it, or to prescribe the basis upon which the question contained in it must be answered. A further element is that the Court, not being formally obliged to comply with the Request at all (even though it might otherwise be right for it to do so), is necessarily the master, and the only master, of the basis upon which it will do so, if in fact it decides to comply.

15. Subject to what has just been said, I agree with the conclusion of the Court that it should comply with the Request, though not with some of the reasoning on which that conclusion is based⁶. I take this view even though I have no doubt that the present proceedings represent an attempt to use the Court for a purely political end, namely as a step towards the setting up of the territory of South West Africa as a new sovereign independent State, to be called “Namibia”, irrespective of what the consequences of this might be at the present juncture. This aim is made perfectly clear by operative paragraphs 1, 2 and 6 of Resolution 2145 itself, which is reproduced here in extenso:

⁶ In particular as regards the question of the existence in this case of a “dispute” or “legal question pending” between States—as to which see section 4 below. But the “pendency” of a dispute or legal question is not per se a ground on which the Court must refuse to give an advisory opinion to the requesting organ. Where the Court was to blame, was in not applying the contentious procedure to the present advisory proceedings, as it had the power to do—(again see section 4 below).

“The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the inalienable right of the people of South West Africa to freedom and independence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and earlier Assembly resolutions concerning the Mandated Territory of South West Africa,

Recalling the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 11 July 1950, accepted by the General Assembly in its resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950, and the advisory opinions of 7 June 1955 and 1 June 1956 as well as the judgement of 21 December 1962, which have established the fact that South Africa continues to have obligations under the Mandate which was entrusted to it on 17 December 1920 and that the United Nations as the successor to the League of Nations has supervisory powers in respect of South West Africa,

Gravely concerned at the situation in the Mandated Territory, which has seriously deteriorated following the judgement of the International Court of Justice of 18 July 1966,

Having studied the reports of the various committees which had been established to exercise the supervisory functions of the United Nations over the administration of the Mandated Territory of South West Africa,

Convinced that the administration of the Mandated Territory by South Africa has been conducted in a manner contrary to the Mandate, the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Reaffirming its resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965, in particular paragraph 4 thereof which condemned the policies of apartheid and racial discrimination practised by the Government of South Africa in South West Africa as constituting a crime against humanity,

Emphasizing that the problem of South West Africa is an issue falling within the terms of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV),

Considering that all the efforts of the United Nations to induce the Government of South Africa to fulfil its obligations in respect of the administration of the Mandated Territory and to ensure the well-being and security of the indigenous inhabitants have been of no avail,

Mindful of the obligations of the United Nations towards the people of South West Africa,

Noting with deep concern the explosive situation which exists in the southern region of Africa,

Affirming its right to take appropriate action in the matter, including the right to revert to itself the administration of the Mandated Territory,

1. Reaffirms that the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) are fully applicable to the people of the Mandated Territory of South West Africa and that, therefore, the people of South West Africa have the inalienable right to self-determination, freedom and independence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations;

2. Reaffirms further that South West Africa is a territory having international status and that it shall maintain this status until it achieves independence;

3. Declares that South Africa has failed to fulfil its obligations in respect of the administration of the Mandated Territory and to ensure the moral and material well-being and security of the indigenous inhabitants of South West Africa and has, in fact, disavowed the Mandate;

4. Decides that the Mandate conferred upon His Britannic Majesty to be exercised on his behalf by the Government of the Union of South Africa is therefore terminated, that South Africa has no other right to administer the Territory and that henceforth South West Africa comes under the direct responsibility of the United Nations;

5. Resolves that in these circumstances the United Nations must discharge those responsibilities with respect to South West Africa;

6. Establishes an Ad Hoc Committee for South West Africa—composed of fourteen Member States to be designated by the President of the General Assembly—to recommend practical means by which South West Africa should be administered, so as to enable the people of the Territory to exercise the right of self-determination and to achieve independence, and to report to the General Assembly at a special session as soon as possible and in any event not later than April 1967;

7. Calls upon the Government of South Africa forthwith to refrain and desist from any action, constitutional, administrative, political or otherwise, which will in any manner whatsoever alter or tend to alter the present international status of South West Africa;

8. Calls the attention of the Security Council to the present resolution;

9. Requests all States to extend their whole-hearted co-operation and to render assistance in the implementation of the present resolution;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all the assistance necessary to implement the present resolution and to enable the Ad Hoc Committee for South West Africa to perform its duties.

*1454th plenary meeting,
27 October 1966.*

If there could be any doubt it would be resolved by the two following more recent and conclusive pieces of evidence:

- (a) General Assembly Resolution 2248 (S-V) of 19 May 1967, after reaffirming Resolution 2145 and appointing a "Council for South West Africa" which later became known as the "Council for Namibia", ended as follows:

"Decides that South West Africa shall become independent on a date to be fixed in accordance with the wishes of the people and that the Council shall do all in its power to enable independence to be attained by June 1968."

- (b) On 29 January 1971, when the whole matter was already sub judice before the Court and the oral proceedings had actually started⁷, the United Nations "Council for Namibia" issued a statement commenting on the South African proposal for holding a plebiscite in SW. Africa under the joint supervision of the Court and the Government of the Republic, and finishing as follows:

"Furthermore, the issue at stake is the independence of Namibia, and not whether the Government of South Africa or the United Nations should administer the Territory. The United Nations decisions in this matter are aimed at achieving the independence of Namibia, and not its administration by the United Nations, except for a brief transitional period."

16. Despite the revealing character of these statements, and despite its obvious political background and motivation, the question put to the Court is, in itself, essentially a legal one. Moreover, in fact, most advisory proceedings have a political background. It could hardly be otherwise, as the Court pointed out in the Certain Expenses case with reference to interpretations of the Charter (I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 155, in fine). But as the Court equally pointed out in that case (echoing a similar dictum made on a previous occasion ⁸), such a background does not of itself impart a political character to the question the Court is asked to answer, and this is the important consideration. It would seem therefore that the political background of a question would only justify a refusal to answer where this background loomed so large as to impart a political character to the question also. In spite of doubts as to whether something of the kind has not occurred in the present case ⁹, the legal character of the questions themselves remains.

⁷ A sitting in camera was held on 27 January 1971 to hear the South African request for the appointment of a judge ad hoc. The public hearings started on February 8.

4. The question of the appointment of a South African judge ad hoc

(a) The relevant provisions of the Court's Statute and Rules

17. The Court's rejection of the South African request to be allowed to appoint a judge ad hoc in the present case was embodied in the Order of the Court of 29 January 1971 to which my colleagues Judges Gros, Petrén and I appended a joint dissenting declaration reserving our right to give reasons for this at a later stage. In my opinion this rejection was wrong in law, and also unjustified as a matter of equity and fair dealing,—for it was obvious, and could not indeed be denied by the Court, that South Africa had a direct, distinctive and concrete special interest to protect in this case, quite different in kind from the general and common interest that other States had as Members of the United Nations. In short, South Africa had, and was alone in having, precisely the same type of interest in the whole matter that a litigant defendant has,—and should therefore have been granted the same right that any litigant before the Court possesses, namely that, if there is not already a judge of its own nationality amongst the regular judges of the Court, it can, under Article 31 of the Statute of the Court, appoint a judge ad hoc to sit for the purposes of the case ¹⁰.

18. The Court's refusal to allow this was thrown into particular relief

⁸ See for instance the first Admissions of New Members case (I.C.J. Reports 1947/1948, at p. 61).

⁹ The present case might well be regarded as being at the least a borderline one, for the political nature of the background is unusually prominent. Yet the two main questions involved, namely whether the Mandate has been validly terminated or not and, if it has, what are the legal consequences for States, are in themselves questions of law. The doubt arises from the way in which the request is framed, suggesting that the Court is to answer the second question only, and postulating the first as already settled. It is above all this which imparts a political twist to the whole Request.

¹⁰ There would naturally have been no objection to the appointment also of one judge ad hoc to represent the common interest of what was in effect "the other side",—and see further notes 14 and 15 below.

by the almost simultaneous rejection, in the three Orders of the Court dated 26 January 1971, of the South African challenge concerning the propriety of three regular judges of the Court sitting in the case,—a matter on which, as to the third of these Orders, I wish to associate myself with the views expressed in the early part of his dissenting opinion in the present case by my colleague Judge Gros. In the light of the explanations as to this, given in the Opinion of the Court, it has now to be concluded that, outside the literal terms of Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Statute, no previous connexion with the subject-matter of a case, however close, can prevent a judge from sitting, unless he himself elects as a matter of conscience not to do so.

* * *

19. On the question of a judge ad hoc, the immediately relevant provision is Article 83 of the Court's Rules, which reads as follows:

“If the advisory opinion is requested upon a legal question actually pending between two or more States, Article 31 of the Statute shall apply, as also the provisions of these Rules concerning the application of that Article.”

If this provision was the only relevant one, it would be a reasonable inference from it that a judge ad hoc could not be allowed unless the case had the character specified. In the present one it was obvious that a legal question was involved,—or the Court would have lacked all power to comply with the Request for an advisory opinion (see Article 96, paragraph 1, of the United Nations Charter and Article 65, paragraph 1, of the Court's Statute). But could it be said to be a question “actually pending between two or more States”? I shall give my reasons later on for thinking that it was of this kind. But for the purposes of my principal ground for holding that the South African request should have been allowed, it is not strictly necessary for me to determine whether the legal questions concerned were “pending”; and if pending, “actually pending”; and if actually pending, then actually pending “between two or more States”, and if so which ones, etc., etc.;—for in my view the matter is not exclusively governed by the provisions of Article 83 of the Rules, which I consider do not exhaust the Court's power to allow the appointment of a judge ad hoc.

* * *

20. The contrary view is based on a misreading of the true intention and effect of Rule 83 when considered in relation to Article 68 of the Statute which reads as follows:

“In the exercise of its advisory functions, the Court shall . . . ¹¹ be guided by the provisions of the present statute which apply in contentious cases to the extent to which it recognizes them to be applicable.”

This provision of course covers Article 31 of the Statute, and hence confers on the Court a general power to apply that Article by allowing the appointment of a judge ad hoc if requested. Furthermore, the provisions of the Rules are subordinated to those of the Statute. The Court has no power to make Rules that conflict with its Statute: hence any rule that did so conflict would be pro tanto invalid, and the Statute would prevail.

21. However, I can see no conflict between Rule 83 and Article 68 of the Statute. They deal with different aspects of the matter. The latter (Article 68), despite its quasi-mandatory form, confers what is in effect a power or discretion on the Court to assimilate requests for advisory opinions to contentious cases, either in whole or in part. Rule 83 on the other hand contains what amounts to a direction by the Court to itself as to how it is to exercise this discretion in certain specified circumstances. If those circumstances are found to obtain, then the Rule obliges the Court to allow the appointment of a judge ad hoc. But this in no way means, nor was ever intended to mean, that by making Rule 83 the Court parted with the residual discretion it has under Article 68 of the Statute, and that in no other circumstances than those specified in Rule 83 could the Court allow such an appointment. The object of the Rule was not to specify the only class of case in which the Court could so act, but to indicate the one class in which it must do so, and to ensure that, at least in the type of case contemplated in the Rule, the Court's discretion should be exercised in a positive way, in the sense of applying Article 31 of the Statute. This was entirely without prejudice to the possibility that there might be other cases than those indicated in the Rule, as to which the Court might feel that, though not obliged to apply Article 31, it ought nevertheless for one reason or another to do so. This view is borne out by the language of Article 82, paragraph 1, of the Rules, which relates to the application in advisory proceedings of any of the contentious procedure provisions, not merely those of Article 31. After recapitulating the general language of Article 68, it goes on to say that “for this purpose” (i.e., in order to determine the sphere of application—if any—of the contentious procedure), the Court is “above all” to consider “whether the request . . . relates to a legal question actually pending between two or more States". This wording clearly makes the test of legal pendency a primary, but equally clearly not a conclusive factor.

¹¹ The omitted word is “further”, which is quite otiose in the context since there is no other paragraph, or article of the Statute dealing with the matter to which this one could be “further”.

* * *

22. It has been contended that although the foregoing description of the relationship between the various provisions concerned might otherwise be correct, it must nevertheless break down on the actual wording of Article 31 itself, particularly its second and third paragraphs which, it has been claimed, not only clearly contemplate the case of "parties" to an actual litigation but are virtually incapable of functioning in any other circumstances, so that at the very least the requirements of Rule 83 constitute a minimum and sine qua non, in the absence of which no application of Article 31 is possible. I have difficulty in following the logic of this view which, if it were correct, would go far in practice to clawing back almost everything supposed to have been conferred by Rule 83, and rendering that provision a piece of useless verbiage,—for even where the case is indubitably one of a legal question actually pending between two or more States, it would be rare in advisory proceedings to find a situation such that Article 31 could be applied to it integrally as that provision stands, and without gloss or adaptation. It is in fact manifest that the provisions of the Statute and Rules concerning contentious cases were quite naturally and inevitably drafted with litigations and parties to litigations in mind. Hence these provisions are bound to be—as they are—full of passages and expressions that are not literally applicable to cases where there is no actual litigation and no parties technically in the posture of litigants,—in short to the vast majority of the cases in which there are advisory proceedings. Consequently the power given to the Court by Article 68 of the Statute to be guided by the contentious procedure would be largely nullified in practice unless it were deemed to include a power to adapt and tailor this procedure to the advisory situation. The very words "shall be guided by" indicate that such a process is contemplated.

23. In the present case in particular, no difficulty could have arisen, for the sufficient reason that, apart from South Africa, no other State presenting written or oral statements asked to be allowed to appoint a judge ad hoc, although they in fact had the opportunity of doing so¹²,—and moreover representatives of four such States actually attended the separate and preliminary oral hearing held (*in camera*¹³) on this matter, but none of them intervened either to oppose the application or to make a similar one. Had any two or more such applications been received, in addition to South Africa's, the Court would have had to consider, under Article 3, paragraph 2, of its Rules, whether the States concerned, or any group of them, not already comprising between them a judge of the nationality of one of them amongst the regular judges of the Court, were "in the same interest"¹⁴, in which event only one ad hoc judge per such group could have been allowed¹⁵.

¹² The Court does not normally invite the appointment of a judge ad hoc. The matter is entirely facultative, and there have been cases where, even in a litigation, and although neither or none of the parties had a judge of its nationality on the Court, no designation of a judge ad hoc has been made.

24. Reference is made in the Opinion of the Court to the Permanent Court's Order of 31 October 1935 in the Danzig Legislative Decrees case (Annex 1 to Series A/B, No. 65, at pp. 69-71). That case however has no relevance to the present one; for in 1935 no provision corresponding to what is now Article 68 of the Statute figured in the Statute as it then stood. The latter, in fact, contained no provisions at all about the advisory jurisdiction, which rested entirely on Article 14 of the Covenant of the League and the Court's own Rules. It was therefore inevitable that the Court should feel it had no discretion as to the appointment of a judge ad hoc unless the matter fell strictly within the terms of those Rules. Hence the Legislative Decrees case constitutes no precedent, either for the view that the Court lacks a discretion now, or for a refusal to exercise that discretion (which the Permanent Court, not then having one, could not in any event have exercised). The situation being in consequence quite different, it becomes evident that if, under Article 68, of the Statute—which takes precedence of the Rules, there is (as is unquestionably the case) a discretion to "be guided by the provisions of the . . . Statute which apply in contentious cases" (including therefore Article 31) there must be a discretion to allow the appointment of a judge ad hoc—one of the most important parts of the contentious process. No (manifestly non-existent) doctrine of the Court's inability to regulate its own composition could operate to prevent this.

* * *

¹³ See Article 46 of the Statute. The hearing takes place before the full Court and in the main Court-room as if for a public sitting, but press and public are excluded. The decision to sit in private despite South Africa's strong representations to the contrary, was in my view mistaken and unwise (as was indeed subsequently impliedly admitted by the decision to publish the verbatim record of the sitting).

¹⁴ Which, in advisory proceedings could be read as meaning the adoption of broadly the same view on the main legal questions involved. Any State asking to appoint a judge ad hoc, which had signified its intention to take part in the oral proceedings, but had not previously presented any written statement, could have been requested to furnish a brief indication of its principal views or contentions.

¹⁵ In the present proceedings all the States which intervened, either at the written or the oral stage of the proceedings (apart from South Africa), could be said to be in the same (legal) interest, except France,—but there was already a French judge among the regular judges of the Court.

25. In the light of these various considerations, it is clear that the Court in no way lacked the power to grant the South African request, but was simply unwilling to do so. In this I think the Court was not justified, particularly in view of the fact that the request was unopposed which, to my mind, indicated a tacit recognition by the other intervening States of the contentious features of the case. The present proceedings, though advisory in form, had all the characteristics of a contentious case as to the substance of the issues involved¹⁶, no less than had the actual litigation between South Africa and certain other States which terminated five years ago, and of which these advisory proceedings have been but a continuation in a different form. Even if, therefore, the Court did not consider the matter to come under Article 83 of its Rules, in such a way as to oblige it to allow a judge ad hoc to be appointed, it should have exercised its residual discretionary powers to the same effect.

(b) The existence of a dispute or legal question pending between States

26. The above expression of view has proceeded upon the assumption that, in order to determine whether the Court could grant the South African request, and should do so, it was unnecessary to decide whether the case fell within the strict terms of Rule 83. In fact, however, I consider that it does, and that any other conclusion is unrealistic and can only be reached by a closing of the eyes to the true position. It really involves something that gets very near to equating the words "a legal question actually pending between two or more States" in Rule 83, with circumstances in which two or more States are in a condition of actual or immediately impending litigation. But, as I have already pointed out, such an interpretation would virtually nullify the intended effect of Rule 83 by restricting its scope to situations that seldom take that precise form in advisory proceedings.

27. The nub of the whole difficulty lies in the word "pending"; but if this is taken on its normal dictionary acceptance¹⁷ of "remaining undecided" or "not yet decided", and "not terminated" or "remaining unsettled",—or in short "still outstanding",—then it is evident that there is a whole series of legal questions in issue (or in dispute) between South Africa on the one hand and a number of other States, and that these questions are, in this sense, outstanding and unresolved, inasmuch as the view held on one side as to their correct solution differs in toto from that taken on the other. Would it be possible for instance to find a more concrete and fundamental issue of this kind than one which turns on whether the Mandate for SW. Africa has been legally terminated or is still in existence; whether South Africa is functus officio in SW. Africa or is still entitled to administer that territory, and whether South Africa's continued presence there is an illegal usurpation or is in the legitimate exercise of a constitutional authority? It would surely be difficult to think of a more sharply controversial situation than one in which, depending on the answers to be given to these questions, South Africa is on the one side being called upon to quit the territory, while she herself asserts her right to remain there,—in which it is maintained on the one side that the whole matter has been settled by the General Assembly resolution 2145 of 1966, and on the other that this resolution was ultra vires and devoid of legal effect,—and therefore settled nothing. The case in fact falls exactly within the definition of a dispute which, following my former colleague Judge Morelli, I gave in my separate opinion in the Northern Cameroons case (I.C.J. Reports 1963, at p. 109), when I said that the essential requirement was that:

¹⁶ In consequence of which the Court found itself obliged in practice, and in a manner virtually unprecedented in previous advisory proceedings, to conduct the oral hearing as if a litigation were in progress.

¹⁷ As given in up-to-date publications such as Chambers Twentieth Century Dictionary and the New Penguin English Dictionary.

“... the one party [or parties] should be making, or should have made, a complaint, claim or protest about an act, omission or course of conduct, present or past of the other party, which the latter refutes, rejects or denies the validity of, either expressly, or else implicitly by persisting in the acts, omissions or conduct complained of, or by failing to take the action, or make the reparation, demanded”.

If this does not describe the situation as it has long existed, and now exists, between the United Nations or many of its member States, and South Africa, I do not know what does.

* * *

28. Nevertheless it may be suggested that these issues, concrete and unresolved as they are, and hence, in the natural and ordinary sense, “pending” and “actually pending”, are not, within the primarily intended meaning of the words, pending “between two or more States”, because they lie too much at large between South Africa and either the United Nations as an entity, or a group of its Members rather than as individual States. In other circumstances there might be a good deal to be said in favour of this view. But the Assembly resolution purporting to terminate the Mandate has led to a situation in which, as it was one of its objects, this resolution is being made the basis of individual action taken outside the United Nations by a number of States in their relations with South Africa over SW. Africa, as described in some detail by Counsel for South Africa at the preliminary oral hearing held on 27 January 1971¹⁸.

29. One example must (but will) suffice—namely the situation which has arisen over the application to South West Africa of the 1965 Montreux International Telecommunication Convention. When becoming a party to this Convention, South Africa gave notice in proper form applying it to SW. Africa also. Thereupon a number of States¹⁹ addressed official communications to the Secretariat of the International Telecommunication Union, which were all to the same effect, namely that precisely by reason of Assembly resolution 2145 purporting to terminate the Mandate, South Africa no longer had the right to administer or speak for SW. Africa, and that, in consequence, the application of the Convention to that territory was invalid and of no effect. The Administrative Council of the Union then, in May 1967, circularized the member States with a request for their views on the matter, which was put to them in the form whether South Africa's right to represent SW. Africa "should be withdrawn". To this South Africa, on 23 May 1967, sent a full and reasoned reply affirming its continuing right to represent SW. Africa. Nevertheless at the next session of the Union a majority voted in favour of the "withdrawal". There now in consequence exists a clear-cut and concrete dispute, not only between South Africa and a majority of the members of the Union as such, but also individually between South Africa and those specific members who initiated and raised the issue in the first place. The subject-matter of this dispute is whether or not the 1965 Convention is or is not applicable to SW. Africa;—and this dispute, or legal question (to use the language of Rule 83), not only is actually pending between South Africa and those States, and continues so to be, but also constituted one of the alleged possible "legal consequences" of the purported termination of the Mandate which the Court might have to consider in the present proceedings.

* * *

30. For these reasons, were it necessary to hold (as in my view it is not) that the Court had no residual power outside Rule 83 to allow the appointment of a South African judge ad hoc, I should take the view that the conditions specified in the Rule were fully satisfied and that it was applicable so as to oblige the Court to grant the request, as justice and equity in any event called for, in the exercise of its undoubted discretionary power. In fact, if ever there was a case for allowing the appointment of a judge ad hoc in advisory proceedings, that case was this one.

¹⁸ Typescript of verbatim record, C.R. (H.C.) 71/1 (Rev.), pp. 19-28.

¹⁹ These were, in the order named in the record (see preceding note), the Federal Republic of Cameroon, Yugoslavia, Tanzania, United Arab Republic, Soviet Union, Ukrainian S.S.R., Byelorussian S.S.R. and Poland.

* * *

31. On the basis of the foregoing views two somewhat serious consequences would ensue. The first is that, in refusing to allow the appointment of a judge ad hoc, the Court in effect decided that the proceedings did not involve any dispute, and thus prejudged the substance of a number of issues raised by South Africa which turned on the existence or otherwise of a dispute,—although no argument had yet been heard on these issues, nor was until after the Order embodying the Court's decision on the matter had been issued. This created a situation in which, in most national legal systems, the case would, on appeal, have been sent back for a re-trial. Similarly the Court virtually precluded itself from going into any question of fact; for disputed issues of fact are difficult to deal with except on the basis of a contentious procedure involving recognition of the existence of a dispute. This again was in advance of having heard the South African argument on the question of the admission of further factual evidence,—although the Court was, from the start, under written notice of the South African view that such further evidence was relevant and important. These views are not affected by the fact that, as the Opinion of the Court correctly observes, a decision on the question of a judge ad hoc, being a matter of the composition of the Court, had to be taken in advance of everything else,—although this situation may well point to a somewhat serious flaw in the present Rules. It cannot however affect the fact that, having rejected the request for the appointment of a judge ad hoc—and on the very ground that there was no dispute or legal question pending (for if the Court had thought there was, Rule 83 would have obliged it to grant the request)—the Court was thenceforward precluded in practice, in connexion with anything arising later in the case, from coming to a different conclusion as to the existence of a dispute or legal question pending. Had the Court, without prejudging these matters, simply exercised its discretion in the sense of allowing the appointment (as in my view it should in any case have done), no difficulty would have arisen. But it should at least, and at that stage, have heard full argument on the question, in the course of ordinary public hearings.

32. Secondly, the failure to allow the appointment of a judge ad hoc, coupled with the views expressed by my colleague Judge Gros, which I share, concerning the third of the three Orders of the Court referred to in paragraph 18 of this Annex, arouses in me a number of misgivings, as to which it will suffice here to say that I associate myself entirely with what is stated at the end of paragraph 17 of Judge Gros' Opinion.

(Initialed) G.F.

APPENDIX I: Universal Declaration of Human Rights

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now, Therefore THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY proclaims THIS UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1.

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2.

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

Article 3.

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4.

No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.

Article 5.

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 6.

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 7.

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 8.

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 9.

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 10.

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11.

(1) Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

(2) No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

Article 12.

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 13.

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

(2) Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

Article 14.

(1) Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

(2) This right may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 15.

(1) Everyone has the right to a nationality.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 16.

(1) Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

(2) Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.

(3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

Article 17.

(1) Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 18.

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 19.

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 20.

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

(2) No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

Article 21.

(1) Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.

(2) Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

(3) The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures.

Article 22.

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.

Article 23.

- (1) Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.
- (2) Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.
- (3) Everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration ensuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity, and supplemented, if necessary, by other means of social protection.
- (4) Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 24.

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure, including reasonable limitation of working hours and periodic holidays with pay.

Article 25.

- (1) Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.
- (2) Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance. All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Article 26.

- (1) Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.
- (2) Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.
- (3) Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.

Article 27.

(1) Everyone has the right freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits.

(2) Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author.

Article 28.

Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 29.

(1) Everyone has duties to the community in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible.

(2) In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.

(3) These rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 30.

Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein.